

This article was downloaded by: [National Taiwan University]

On: 15 January 2015, At: 12:04

Publisher: Routledge

Informa Ltd Registered in England and Wales Registered Number: 1072954 Registered office: Mortimer House, 37-41 Mortimer Street, London W1T 3JH, UK

South Asia: Journal of South Asian Studies

Publication details, including instructions for authors and subscription information:

<http://www.tandfonline.com/loi/csas20>

The Gurav temple priests of Maharashtra

Jayant Balchandra Bapat ^a

^a La Trobe University

Published online: 08 May 2007.

To cite this article: Jayant Balchandra Bapat (1993) The Gurav temple priests of Maharashtra , South Asia: Journal of South Asian Studies, 16:s1, 79-100, DOI: 10.1080/00856409308723193

To link to this article: <http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/00856409308723193>

PLEASE SCROLL DOWN FOR ARTICLE

Taylor & Francis makes every effort to ensure the accuracy of all the information (the "Content") contained in the publications on our platform. However, Taylor & Francis, our agents, and our licensors make no representations or warranties whatsoever as to the accuracy, completeness, or suitability for any purpose of the Content. Any opinions and views expressed in this publication are the opinions and views of the authors, and are not the views of or endorsed by Taylor & Francis. The accuracy of the Content should not be relied upon and should be independently verified with primary sources of information. Taylor and Francis shall not be liable for any losses, actions, claims, proceedings, demands, costs, expenses, damages, and other liabilities whatsoever or howsoever caused arising directly or indirectly in connection with, in relation to or arising out of the use of the Content.

This article may be used for research, teaching, and private study purposes. Any substantial or systematic reproduction, redistribution, reselling, loan, sub-licensing, systematic supply, or distribution in any form to anyone is expressly forbidden. Terms & Conditions of access and use can be found at <http://www.tandfonline.com/page/terms-and-conditions>

THE GURAV TEMPLE PRIESTS OF MAHARASHTRA*¹

Jayant Balchandra Bapat
La Trobe University

The state of Maharashtra with a population of over sixty-three million, is culturally and geographically a bridge between northern (Uttarapatha) and the southern (Dakshinapatha) Hinduism.² The ancient trade routes between the north and the south pass tortuously over the lower hills and through the occasional flats of the western districts of Maharashtra. Because of its unique placement, Maharashtra possesses the common elements of both of these traditions within Hinduism and gives the area a culturally distinct character. Thus, people worship both Shiva and Vishnu almost equally and the traditional rivalry between the Shaivite and Vaishnavite sects found in the south, and the recognisable reluctance on the part of the vania (vaishya) castes of Gujarat (to the north of Maharashtra) to worship Shiva is absent in Maharashtra.³

Patterns of caste groupings, eating habits and religious customs including marriage also reflect this blend.⁴ As in most parts of India, jatidharma (caste duty) is the mainstay of Marathi society and people thus fall into numerous castes and sub-castes (jatis and upajatis) in their social, religious and cultural interaction.⁵ Traditionally, the jajmani system known in Marathi as Balute (Baluta) made a village of cluster of villages self-sufficient.⁶

* This paper is dedicated to the memory of Günther Dietz Sontheimer (1934-1992), an outstanding researcher in the folk culture of Maharashtra.

¹ The author is grateful to Drs G. Bailey, M. Vicziany, V. Thonte and R. Desai for their helpful suggestions, to Ranga Pailwan for the Manuscript 'Sthulshaivagama', to Omdatta Arya for the book Gaurav and to Ganesh Suradkar for the manuscript 'Laghu Shaivagama'. I am also grateful to La Trobe University for two travel grants for the field-work in India.

² Aryavata (Uttarapatha) and Dakshinapatha are the two main natural divisions of India divided by the Vindhya mountains. The division has been recognised since the time of the Manusmriti. G. Buhler (trans.), The Laws of Manu, in M. Muller (ed.), The Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXV, [O.U.P., 1886], (rep. Motilal Banarasidass, 1964), pp. 2, 22; see also Government of Maharashtra, Apala Maharashtra (Bombay, Government Printer, 1985), p. 31.

³ I. Karve, Maharashtra: Land and its People (Maharashtra State Gazetteer, Bombay, Government Printer, 1968), p. 184.

⁴ E. Zelliott and A. Feldhaus, 'Marathi Religions' in M. Eliade (ed.), Encyclopaedia of Religions, Vol. 9 (New York, Macmillan, 1987), p. 190.

⁵ P. G. Sahasrabuddhe, Maharashtra Samskriti (Pune, Continental Prakashan, 1979), p. 628.

⁶ S. V. Ketkar (ed.), Maharashtriyia Jnanakosha (Nagpur, Maharashtratryia Jnanakosha Mandal, 1920), Vol. A, p. 527.

Inscriptional evidence suggests that this system, with its roots in ancient India,⁷ was in existence in Maharashtra by 1500 A.D.⁸ The Gurav priestly caste with whom we are concerned in this essay forms the ninth balutedar in the scheme. Maharashtra's balutedar system usually consisted of a total of twelve service castes, each of them associated with a specific range of village duties.

The function of the Gurav priestly caste is to manage and maintain the temple and also to act as temple priests. Their current estimated population in Maharashtra is between one and one and a half million, between one and a half and two and a half percent of the total population. The priestly Guravs of this study are distinguished from other Guravs and other non-brahmin priests who also call themselves 'Gurav' by a number of characteristics: they are the numerically dominate Gurav; they are to be found throughout Maharashtra; they do not, as a rule, officiate at small village shrines; they are to be found performing rituals at all kinds of Shiva temples, including large ones; and while they are regarded by Maharashtrian society as shudras (low castes) they all claim to the Shaiva-brahmins. The final point, namely the claims and counterclaims surrounding the Gurav, first alerted me to the subject of my research. In the present essay, this priestly caste of Gurav is also referred to by the name of Shaiva Gurav, Shaiva brahmin or Devalaka brahmin. This is because in their historical and religious literature, the caste has used all these names to describe themselves.

The Gurav priestly caste of Maharashtra seems to be a unique phenomenon in India.⁹ In northern India, for example, the jajmani system in its priestly aspect also involves high-caste landlords making customary payments in kind to their priestly clients. These clients, in turn, reciprocate by providing various kinds of religious and temple services. Throughout northern India, in so far as I have been able to ascertain, these priestly clients are all brahmins. The same appears to be true in south India.¹⁰ However, in the case of Maharashtra, the priests in the jajmani or balute system include non-brahmins like the Gurav. These Gurav priests are no less important to Maharashtra's jajmani system than the brahmin priests. This paper seeks to explain how this anomaly of the jajmani system arose in this part of India: specifically, how far back can we trace the special position of

⁷ D. D. Kosambi, The Culture and Civilisation of Ancient India in Historical Outline (London, Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1965), p. 20.

⁸ A. Chandorkar, 'Bhojashaka 410 teel eka Tamrapata' (A copper plate in Bhojashaka 410), Bharat Itihas Samshodhak Mandal Quarterly, 1923-24, p. 50. Chandorkar describes a copper-plate known as the Pirwadi Copper-Plate which details the trial of a Ganga Naik in the hands of the twelve balutedars of the village. While the date of the inscription is controversial (it could have been written any time between 1200-1500 A.D.), it establishes the Gurav as a balutedar at least as early as 1500 A.D. in Maharashtra.

⁹ H. A. Gould, The Hindu Caste System (Delhi, Chanakya Publications, 1987, ch. 4.

¹⁰ E. Thurston and K. Rangachari, Castes and Tribes of Southern India (Delhi, Cosmo Publications, rep. 1975).

non-brahmin Gurav priests? How did they arise? Why were they tolerated? These questions need to be raised because to a non-Maharashtrian the very idea of a non-brahmin priest performing rituals in any temple is preposterous. The thought is a shocking contravention of the very strict observance of ritual purity in Indian temples, and even within Maharashtra itself the role of non-brahmin Gurav priests appears to draw attention to all kinds of contradictions within mainstream Hinduism.

The Gurav in literature

In my search to explain the origins of the non-brahmin Gurav priests, I first turned to various literary sources. There I found the word 'Gurav' in a number of places.¹¹ The *Maharashtra Shabdakosha*¹² (Maharashtra Dictionary) and the *Marathi Vyutpattikosh*¹³ (Marathi Etymological Dictionary) both state that the word Gurav came from the Kannada word 'Gorava' meaning a Shaiva mendicant or Shiva himself in the guise of a mendicant. The information about Gurav occupations, food habits, dress, contained in these sources portrays the Gurav as a shudra ministrant in temples. The stereotype which emerges from this literature can be summarised as follows:

The Gurav is a non-brahmin priestly class among shudras and is involved in the worship of Shiva and village deities such as Maruti, Khandoba and Ambabai. The main divisions among the Gurav and Shaiva Gurav, Kadu Gurav, Lingayat Gurav, Bhavik Burav and Fain Gurav. Unlike the Shaivas whose diacritical mark is three horizontal lines of sandalwood paste on the forehead, and Vaishnavas, whose mark consists of three vertical lines, the Gurav put a sandalwood dot on their forehead. As a balutedar, the Gurav is the official worshipper of the village deity. The Gurav are vegetarians and their staple food is shorghum (jvari), pulse and vegetables. Lingayat Gurav wear a Lingam on the necklace around their neck whereas others wear the sacred thread. Hugar, Jeer and Malgar are subdivisions with Lingayat Gurav. As official worshippers (pujaris) of the village deity, many Gurav have land bequeathed

- 11 R. V. Russell and Hira Lal, Tribes and Castes of the Central Provinces of India (Delhi, Rajdhani Book Centre, rep. 1975), Vol. 3, p. 175; see also J. Grant Duff, History of the Mahrattas [1826], (ed.) J. D. Guha (New Delhi, Associated Publishing House, 1971), Vol. 1, p. 483; G. M. Kalelkar, Mumbai Ilakhyateel Jati (Baroda, Sayaji Granthamala, no. 138, 1928), p. 73; S. V. Ketkar, op. cit., Vol. A, p. 168; M. M. Tanksale, 'Asa Zala Gurav Samajacha Uday', Gurav Samaj Rashtriya Adhiveshana Paithan, Commemorative volume (ed.) S. S. Khandalkar (Aurangabad, Nath Mudranalaya, 1990), p. 1; Y. R. Date and C. G. Karve (eds), Maharashtra Vaksampradaya Kosha (Pune, Maharashtra Koshamandala Ltd, 1947), p. 410; Gazetteer of the Bombay Presidency (Bombay, Govt. Central Press, 1884), Vol. XXI, Belgaum, p. 106; 1884, Vol. XXIII, Bijapur, p. 264; 1890, Kolhapur, p. 142.
- 12 Y. R. Date and C. G. Karve (eds), Maharashtra Shabdakosha (Poona, Varada Books, 1934), Vol. 3, p. 1006.
- 13 K. P. Kulkarni (ed.), Marathi Vyutpattikosh (Pune, Shri Lekhan Wachan Bhandar, 1963), p. 261.

to them. The priests of the Gurav are Maratha brahmins to whom they show great respect. The other occupations of the Gurav include making and selling leaf-plates, flowers and Bel leaves (Aegle marmelas) used in the worship of Shiva, acting as village musicians (blowing conch shells, playing drums, trumpets and other musical instruments) and making the 'Bashing' (coronet of flowers) that the bridegroom wears. The Gurav are also known to be the spiritual leaders of the kalavats (dancing girls) in Goa. In Goa and the Konkan areas of Maharashtra one of the duties of the Gurav in many temples is to solicit omens from the idol and to seek answers to specific questions asked by the devotee.¹⁴ Such a shamanistic ritual is still followed in several temples in the region.

A number of problems arise from this stereotype. First, the extant literature suggests that all 'Guravs' form a homogenous group. Secondly, this 'ideal type' wrongly assumes that the social identity of the village priest who calls himself 'Gurav' is the same as the temple priest by the same name. Thirdly, it confuses temple ministrants who are Jains and Lingayats with the Gurav priestly caste. These Jain and Lingayat 'Gurav' only call themselves 'Gurav' because that word has assumed the generic meaning of 'someone who officiates in a temple'.

While the stereotype of the 'Gurav' suffers from gross oversimplification, it does recognise some internal differentiation within a Gurav conglomerate. However, the differentiation it addresses is largely spurious. The sources referred to talk of several divisions and sub-divisions (castes and sub-castes) among the Gurav. Grant Duff,¹⁵ who classified the Gurav as shudras, thought that major sub-divisions among them reflected territorial divisions. Thus according to him, the Warade come from Berar, the Telanga from Telugu country, the Dakshine from the Deccan and the Marwari from Marwar. Enthoven,¹⁶ on the other hand, lists the following endogamous divisions among the Gurav:

1. Shaiva Gurav: also called Nagari, Nilkantha and Swayambhu Gurav.
2. Kadu Gurav: also known as Junnare, Kotsane or Gasrat.
3. Lingayat Gurav with Hugar, Jeer and Malgar as the main sub-divisions.
4. Konkani or Bhavik Gurav.
5. Jain Gurav from the Malvan taluka of Ratnagiri district.

¹⁴ R. N. Kelkar, 'Konkan Prantateel Gurav Samaj' (The Gurav Community in Konkan Area), Bharat Itihas Samshodhan Mandal Quarterly, Vol. 60, (1981), p. 17.

¹⁵ Grant Duff, op. cit., (ed.), Guha, Vol. 1, p. 483.

¹⁶ R. E. Enthoven, Tribes and Castes of Bombay (Bombay, Govt. Printer, 1920), Vol. 2, p. 27.

As I have already suggested, the ethnohistorians such as Grant Duff, Enthoven and Thurston wrongly regarded all castes bearing the name 'Gurav' as sub-castes of a main Gurav caste. This mis-grouping was probably facilitated by the manner in which their data was collected. The assistance they obtained in their researches invariably came from educated English-speaking brahmins. The latter were (and remain today) totally indifferent to the caste affiliations of temple priests who are inferior to them. To the Marathi brahmins, all non-brahmins were shudras. This seems to have led to a confusion in the documented history between the Gurav priestly caste and the Gurav priests defined as a profession adopted by all manner of castes for financial gains.

To clarify this point, it is essential to examine the caste status of each of the Gurav groups, at this juncture. The Jain Gurav is a very small community restricted to the Malvan district of Konkan, coastal Maharashtra. As described by Enthoven and by Kelkar,¹⁷ they appear to be descendants of Jains who took to the worship of Shiva under the influence of Lingayatism. In this regard, it is interesting to note that many Shiva temples in Konkan contain a Shiva-Linga and another stone or just two stones in the inner sanctum sanctorum (Garbha-Griha). One of the stones is called 'Kashikalyani Brahmana' ('The Brahmin for Benares', referring obviously to Shiva) while the other is called 'the Jain Brahmana'. The latter is taken by the Gurav priest of the temple to represent their Kula-Purusha (male founder of the clan). This may have been originally an image of a Jain Teerthankara (Creator of religion).¹⁸ The Jain Gurav are therefore called 'Gurav' only because they act as temple priests. They are Hindus only because they observe caste endogamy and they worship Shiva. But in all other ways they are Jain.

A similar argument can be advanced for the Lingayat Gurav. The Lingayat Gurav obviously did not exist as an identifiable group before the rise of Lingayatism around 1170 A.D.. As a reformist sect, Lingayatism asserted, among other things, the equality of all human beings a recruited people of low-caste in sizeable numbers in Karnataka. The Hugar (florists), Malgars (copper and brass smiths) and Jeers are among such people. With the persecution of Lingayats in thirteenth century Karnataka, many of them fled to the neighbouring districts of Maharashtra and some of them became temple priests. For the Lingayats, who were staunch Shaivites and well versed in Shaiva rituals, it would not have been difficult to obtain such positions. This would explain the inclusion by Enthoven of Hugar and others among the Lingayat Gurav. Again, as in the case of Jain Gurav, the word Gurav here once again refers to the profession of 'temple priest' and not a separate caste of Gurav. The situation of the Koli (fisherman) and Maratha ministrants of temples is even more clear — only those members of the family who minister to the temple are called Gurav, other family members are not.

¹⁷ Kelkar, op. cit.

¹⁸ Loc. cit.

Like the Jain Gurav, the Bhavik Gurav¹⁹ are also found in Konkan. They minister only to the village deities (gram-devata) and do not work in the Shiva temples of Konkan. Thus, in Konkan villages, a Lingayat Gurav looks after the Shiva temple whereas the Bhavik Gurav ministers to the deities such as Nagoba, Khandoba, Vetāl, Bhairoba, at small shrines usually sited on the outskirts of the village.²⁰ Unlike the Shaiva-Gurav (the priestly caste of Gurav, which concerns me in this paper) the Bhavik Gurav are generally unable to trace their history beyond a few generations. They also have very little modern education or a knowledge of Sanskrit and are non-vegetarian as a rule. They may also drink alcohol. The customs of the Bhavik Gurav are very similar to those of the Maratha and Kunbi communities. It is highly likely that these Gurav came from Maratha or similar castes and were recognised as priests at a later date. They thus represent a development in the Hindu tradition which mimics and parallels the high-caste temple ministrants in the larger temples in the town. The brahmins were probably unwilling to minister to village deities not assimilated into the classical pantheon.

In summary then, the Lingayat, Jain, Koli, Maratha and the Bhavik Gurav cannot be aggregated into a single Gurav caste. The common denominator is that all these 'Gurav' have the same profession — they are temple priests. Hence they acquired the title 'Gurav'. On the other hand, there is evidence to suggest that the Shaiva Gurav, who insist on calling themselves Shaiva-brahmins, are probably the only Gurav who belong to a single self-contained 'caste'. Their position in Marathi society is unique. Firstly, they are acknowledged by other Gurav and by the brahmins to be superior to all other Gurav. Secondly, they are well educated, some with university degrees and a number of them have a working knowledge of Sanskrit. Most importantly, like the brahmins, most Shaiva Gurav have a Gotra identity, an essential criterion for every brahmin. Their customs are similar to those of the Dravida and Deshastha brahmins: they wear a sacred thread and have a conception ritual similar to that of the brahmins. Their priests are also brahmins. However, Gurav rituals, including weddings, are performed by the brahmins in the Puranokta way, as prescribed in the Puranas, not in the Vedokta way (following the Vedas), the latter being reserved strictly for the brahmin castes.²¹ Much of the confusion surrounding the discussion about the Gurav priests' caste arises from the inability of the British to understand that western India had no tradition of using family surnames. When various groups in society described themselves as Gurav, the British assumed a common family ancestry when in reality Maharashtrians used the word 'Gurav' merely to describe a whole collection of social groups who simply performed the 'Gurav' function (priests' function) but without necessarily belonging to the one caste.²²

¹⁹ It is interesting to note that etymologically, the word 'Bhavik' can mean 'one who has become', i.e. those who have adopted 'Guravhood' as a profession.

²⁰ Nagoba is the serpent (Cobra) deity. Khandoba is an incarnation of Shiva, probably a local godling in Maharashtra and Karnataka that merged with Shiva. Vetāl and Bhairoba (Biroba) are spirits associated with Shiva but are also tantric deities. The suffix 'ba' means father.

²¹ There were bitter disputes between Marathi brahmins and other castes in the late 18th and early 19th centuries over the right to recite and hear Vedic chants, known as Vedokta. The brahmins maintained that Vedokta was their exclusive right and in Kaliyuga (the age of decline) the kshatriya and vaishya castes became extinct, thus leaving only two varnas: the brahmins and shudras. The brahmins insisted that for the rituals of the non-brahmin castes, only Puranic (Puranokta) rituals with less sanctity could be used. See M. Israel and N. K. Wagle, Religion and Society in Maharashtra (Toronto, Centre of South Asian Studies, University of Toronto, 1987).

The Shaiva-Gurav have also produced three Jatipuranas (clan-history books) and a recent booklet in support of their claim to brahminic origin. It is to this discrepancy between the perceived status of the Shaiva Gurav as shudras on one hand and their attempts to legitimise and reinforce their brahmin status on the other hand that I wish to devote the rest of this paper. In doing so, I also look at the origin of the word Gurav, which is partly related to the Shaiva-Gurav's claim to brahminhood. I believe that this is necessary because it may lead us to the dawn of Indian history, the possible divisions between brahmins even at that time and the struggle between Aryan and non-Aryan forces, manifested in the initial schism and later union of Shaivism and Aryan religion.

Origin of the term 'Gurav' and the Gurav in history

The origin of the term 'Gurav' is problematic and obscure. However, it is possible to make several observations. Educated and culturally knowledgeable Shaiva-Gurav maintain²³ that the word is the nominative plural of the word Guru, meaning teacher and spiritual leader.²⁴ They insist that in the distant past, all Gurav, as worshippers of Shiva, were held in high esteem in society and were regarded as spiritual guides by the common people. These claims are important as an indication of the attempts by the Shaiva-Gurav to legitimise their position in relation to that of the brahmins who have always looked down upon them. Another possible origin for the ²² Tanksale, op. cit. Tanksale, a Gurav himself, gives the following classification of Gurav names according to their profession:

- (a) Temple associated names: Bhagwan, Nagesh, Siddheshwar, Ekwire, Jagadamb, Markandeya.
- (b) Names according to their profession as priests: Upadhye, Pande, Acharya, Pujari, Rajguru, Gurav.
- (c) Names according to gift of land: Patil, Mokashi, Deshmukh, Kulkarni, Inamdar.
- (d) Names according to military professions: Aglave, Jadhav, Gayakwad, Shinde, Thorat, Bhosale, Rane, Pawar, Kale.
- (e) Names according to skills: Nilkanth, Tanksale.

²³ Personal communication with many educated Gurav. In Sanskrit, the plural Guravah comes from the singular Guruh.

²⁴ Etymologically the word Gurav could have originated from the old Dravidian word Kor (meaning to make a sound), see T. Burrow and M. B. Emeneau, A Dravidian Etymological Dictionary (Oxford University Press, 1961). Philologically the following transformation could thus be feasible:

Kor → Gor → Gorava → Gurav.

word Gurav could be related to the strong association Shiva worship has with the 'Guru' tradition in the Nath cult. Shiva himself has been described as the Guru of the Gods.²⁵ It is, therefore, possible that the person who holds the right to worship Shiva first is called 'Gurav'. It is significant that even the most orthodox brahmins do not deny the Gurav's right to perform the first and last worship of the day in the Shiva temple. In this context, the word Gurav could mean 'of the Guru'.

The word Gurav does not appear in the authoritative Sanskrit dictionaries such as Shabdakalpadruma, Vachaspathyam and others.²⁶ It is also unlikely to be of Prakrit origin because it is not found in Pali and Prakrit dictionaries.²⁷ However, the etymological dictionary of the Marathi language traces the word to the old Kannada language word 'Gorava'. Kittel's *Kannada-English Dictionary*²⁸ also lists the word 'Gorava' as meaning a 'beggar of the Shaiva sect or Shiva himself in the guise of a beggar'. Since Shiva, the titular deity of the Gurav caste, is described in the Puranas as a wandering mendicant with a begging bowl in his hand, it may be that the devotees of this aspect of Shiva were called 'Goravas'.

The evidence seems to suggest that the word Gurav is the Marathi rendering of the Kannada word Gorava. This is given credence by the evidence found in stone inscriptions in the Kannada language. An inscription dated 804 A.D. describes the visit of the Rashtrakuta king Govinda III to the temple of Rameshwaram in Karnataka. Altekar, in his book on the Rashtrakutas makes a point of quoting this inscription and some others²⁹ in an effort to prove the antiquity of the Gurav. The inscription deals with the gift of land by Govinda III to Shivadhari, a Gorava who was the official worshipper at this temple. The second inscription Altekar quotes is the one at Mantrawadi in Dharwad district. This stone inscription asks the Goravas to lead a life of strict celibacy; this suggests that in addition to their role as advisers to the Karnataka kings in religious and educational matters, they 25 The Shabdakalpadrum, Vol. 2, 340 quotes the following hymn about Shiva: 'Adidevo Mahadevo Devesho Devabhrdguruh'. I am grateful to Tarkirtha Narayanshastri Sahakari for suggesting this interpretation. Shiva has also been described as the father of the world: see the first stanza of the Raghuvansha of Kalidasa: Jagatah Pitarou Vande Parvati-Parameshwarau (I bow to Parvati and Shiva, the father and mother of the world).

26 T. Bhattacharya (ed.), Vachaspathyam (Varanasi, Chaukhamba Sanskrit series, 1962). See also Suryakanta, Practical Vedic Dictionary (New Delhi, O.U.P., 1981); M. Monier-Williams, Sanskrit-English Dictionary [1960], (rep. Delhi, Motilal Banarasidass, 1986).

27 T. W. Rhys-Davies and W. Stede (eds), Pali-English Dictionary (London, Pali Text Society, Routledge, Kegan Paul, 1972). See also F. Edgerton, Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit Grammar and Dictionary (rep. Delhi, Motilal Banarasidass, 1972); D. C. Sircar, Indian Epigraphical Glossary (Delhi, Motilal Banarasidass, 1966).

28 F. Kittell, Kannada-English Dictionary (Mangalore, Basel Mission Book and Tract Depository, 1894).

29 A. S. Altekar, The Rashtrakutas and their Times (Poona, Oriental Book Agency, 1934), (rep. 1967), p. 293. Altekar cites the following inscriptions: Fleet 1881: 127, Fleet 1883: 256, Fleet 1945: 198. The Rashtrakutas ruled not only in Maharashtra and Karnataka but also in parts of southern Andhra Pradesh at one stage.

were expected to exemplify, in their personal life style, a high moral character. Finally, Altekar mentions that the Ganga ruler Butuga II appointed a Gorava to worship a tablet raised to commemorate his pet dog which had been killed by a mighty boar.³⁰ These inscriptions point to the special status of the Goravas at the time: they were beneficiaries of gifts of land from the king (Rajadanam) in exchange for which they provided special ritual services.

In addition to this inscriptional evidence the work of modern historians like Basavraja³¹ and Lorenzen³² establishes that the Goravas acted as priests in the non-Vaishnavite temples of Kalamukha by 900 A.D. Basavraja talks of the Goravas in connection with the worship in the non-Vaishnavite temples in Karnataka during the reign of the Rashtrakuta and the Gangas while Lorenzen alludes to the highly exalted position of the Goravas who were Shaivite ascetics of the Kalamukha sect and who were generally responsible for the upkeep and management of the Shiva temples.

The question that remains is whether the Kannada Gorava is the same as the Marathi Gurav. While it is difficult to prove this conclusively, available evidence suggests that such may be the case. Several factors point in this direction. The words are very similar and so are the functions of the two. Moreover, Maharashtra and Karnataka did not exist as separate political entities during this time; rather they were part of the one state. Finally, during interviews with contemporary Gurav in the border area of the two states, it was pointed out to me that the words Gurav and Gorava mean one and the same thing.³³ While the temple priests in Maharashtra are called Gurav, their relatives in Karnataka are called 'Goravas'. Thus the words Gurav and Gorava must refer to a single caste of temple priests found in western India.

In Maharashtra, the earliest mention of a Gurav temple priest comes in the stone inscription at Paithan in Aurangabad district. While it cannot be accurately dated, the writing is believed to have been inscribed around 1140

³⁰ From these inscriptions Altekar makes a somewhat surprising observation: 'It would therefore be permissible to conjecture that Guravas were originally non-Aryan, and very probably Dravidian priests, who continued to officiate at the temples of deities who were non-Aryan. Later on they may have been allowed to be associated with Aryan temples and gods as well.' However, apart from showing the elevated position the Goravas enjoyed in the society of the time, I do not see how such a conclusion can be arrived at.

³¹ K. R. Basavraja, History and Culture of Karnataka (Dharwad, Chalukya Publications, 1984), p. 505.

³² D. N. Lorenzen, The Kapalikas and Kalamukhas [1972], 2nd ed. (Delhi, Motilal Banarasi Dass, 1991), p. 115.

³³ (a) Interview with Ranga Pailwan (Rangnath Balwant Upadhye) of Solapur. A Shaiva-Gurav by birth, his parents came from Karnataka where his father and grandfather were priests. Their family name, 'Upadhye' in fact means 'a professional priest'. His cousins are still practicing priests in Karnataka. His elder brother is well versed in all Shastras (Vedashastrasampanna) and gives religious discourses (Pravarchana) and Kirtanas in Karnataka.
(b) Professor G. V. Tagare, a well-known Sanskritist and Puranic scholar has written to me that the Gurav community is the same in Maharashtra and Karnataka and many are in fact related. In Karnataka they are called Goravas.

A.D. It deals with the division of income at the Someshwar temple and states that the Gurav be given a certain amount of money for the worship and maintenance of the temple.³⁴ A second inscription is located at Ambejogai in Beed district and has been accurately dated to 1228 A.D. in the reign of the Yadav King Sindhana. It deals with the grant of food grains to the Gurav for preparation of offerings for daily worship and for special worship on auspicious occasions.³⁵

Other evidence about the Shaiva-Gurav comes from texts in old Marathi. Books in the Marathi language (Maharashtri and Maharatti in the older forms) did not appear until after 1200 A.D. The Leelacharitra by Mhaimbhat dated 1283 A.D., considered to be one of the very first books, deals with the life of and the miracles performed by Chakradharswami, the founder of the Mahanubhava sect. It throws light on the social and religious conditions in Maharashtra at that time and mentions the Gurav and his wife 'Gurveen' a number of times. According to it, the Gurav and his wife were responsible for cleaning and performing worship in the Shiva temple. Chakradharswami is quoted as saying, 'God does not belong only to the Gurav, he belongs to everyone',³⁶ a statement which contextually suggests that the Gurav were selective in admitting people to the temple. The Leelacharitra also makes it clear that the brahmins looked down upon the Gurav and did not drink water at their hands.³⁷

In his book The Yadavas and their times, Verma³⁸ discusses the religious and social conditions during the Yadava dynasty in twelfth and thirteenth century Maharashtra. He is of the opinion that the Gurav were probably absorbed into the Vaishya varna at this time. Thus the Gurav were prohibited from partaking of food at the 'Shraddha' ceremony in a brahmin's house. Their main function was to look after the bodily comforts of the deities whose temples they tended. From the evidence cited above, it would be reasonable to conclude that in Maharashtra, the worship and maintenance of many Shaivite temples was in the hands of the Gurav by the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

It should be noted, however, that the word Gorava in the Karnataka inscriptions has been replaced with the word Gurav in the Maharashtra inscriptions and in the Marathi language books. All the Maharashtra inscriptions are dated after 1140 A.D. Therefore, the conversion from Gorava to Gurav may have taken place somewhere between 800 to 1100 A.D., during ³⁴ S. G. Tulpule (ed.), Pracheen Marathi Koreev Lekh (Ancient Marathi Inscriptions) (Pune, Pune Uni. Press, 1963), p. 505.

³⁵ Ibid., p. 118.

³⁶ V. B. Kolate (ed.), Leelacharita of Mhaimbhat (Bombay, Maharashtra Rajya Sahitya Samskriti Mandal, 1978), part 1, p. 137.

³⁷ Ibid., part 2, p. 424.

³⁸ O. P. Verma, The Yadavas and their times (Nagpur, Vidarbha Samshodhan Mandal, 1970), pp. 229, 253, 300.

the period when the Chalukyas and then the Rashtrakutas reigned over the area of what is today's Maharashtra. It is said that the mother tongue of the Rashtrakuta kings was Kannada. It has also been argued that Maharashtra was a Kannada-speaking region in the olden times and Marathi developed as a separate language due to the northern influence. The Yadavas of Devagiri supported Marathi whereas the Yadavas of Hoysala retained their Kannada identity.³⁹ It is, therefore, reasonable to assume that the change from Gorava to Gurav took place during this period as the two languages took different paths.

The modern divisions between the states of Karnataka and Maharashtra are not a useful guide to understanding the evolution of the Gurav priestly caste. My research into the origin of the Gurav priestly caste began in Maharashtra but inevitably led to Karnataka where I discovered the Gorava priestly caste. The evidence suggests that not only are the Guravas and Goravas identical but that it is a fair assumption that the Marathi Gurav caste derives from the Kannada Goravas. Having established the social identity of the Gurav, the next section considers their relationship to the brahmin.

The Gurav's claim to Brahminhood and counter claims

Because of the hierarchical nature of the caste system and the status enjoyed by the higher castes, lower castes have periodically striven to elevate themselves to a higher status by a variety of means. Traditionally, the kings could grant or confirm caste status because of the power they wielded. For example, during their time in Maharashtra, the Rashtrakuta royalty formed themselves into a sub-caste of kshatriyas called 'satkshatriyas' and claimed even higher status than brahmins.⁴⁰ The Marathi brahmins sought to undermine such claims by declaring that in the Kaliyuga (the era of decline and catastrophe in classical Hindu thought), the kshatriyas and vaishyas became extinct and only two varnas survived: the brahmin and the shudra.⁴¹ Thus, the brahmin's view of fourteenth century Maharashtra was that there were only two varnas. To keep their explanations neat, a third group, the untouchables, were added later as a sub-rank to the shudra varna.⁴²

³⁹ M. M. Deshpande, Sociolinguistic Attitudes in India (Ann Arbor, Karoma Publishers Inc., 1979), p. 102. See also K. P. Kulkarni, Marathi Bhasha, Udgama Va Vikas (Pune, Modern Book Depot Prakashan, 1963), p. 227. Kulkarni states that the Dravidian languages, Kannada and Telugu, have strongly influenced the Marathi language. These two languages pre-date Marathi and they were spoken in the area of what is Maharashtra today before the birth of Marathi.

⁴⁰ G. Yazdani, The Early History of the Deccan, Vols. 1 and 2 (Delhi, Oriental Book Reprint Corporation, O.U.P., 1982), Vol. 1, p. 309.

⁴¹ Israel and Wager, op. cit., p. 145.

⁴² There are instances of exceptions to this rule as well. The Satvahanas were born out of a hypogamous (Pratiloma) marriage and hence were shudras. They however became mighty kings and performed many sacrifices (Yagnas) which were prohibited for shudras. In another instance, Gagabhatta, the great brahmin pandit from Banares, performed the Upanayana

Up to the early nineteenth century, there was conflict between the brahmins and non-brahmins over the right to recite and hear the Vedas and practice rituals sanctioned by them (Vedokta). For the performance of religious ceremonies, two types of rituals have evolved; the Vedic and the Puranic. The brahmins have always insisted that the Vedic mantras are of great sanctity and that they are therefore the only ones who should recite them. The Puranic ones are not based on revealed knowledge (shruti) and hence they are of less sanctity and could be used by and for non-brahmins. This gave rise to bitter conflicts between the Marathi brahmins and Chandraseniya Kayastha Prabhu (C.K.P.s), a caste which had long claimed to be kshatriyas, at Pune in 1789 and at Baroda and Satara in 1825. The disputes eventually went to court and were resolved in favour of the C.K.P.s.⁴³ The C.K.P.s were given kshatriya status by the courts.

The brahmins in Maharashtra sought to maintain their position by declaring all non-brahmins to be shudras. With a few notable exceptions, such as the C.K.P.s, Marathi brahmins appear to have succeeded in convincing other varnas and castes that all non-brahmins are shudras. One of the most effective means the brahmins employed to do this was the creation of new shudra castes through the employment of the 'Varnasankara' theory developed by Manu and other Gruhyasutra writers. The division of people into four varnas was mainly notional and not strictly adhered to even at the time of the Manusmiti. Hypergamy, which was grudgingly accepted, and hypogamy, which was frowned upon, both took place. Varna structure had, therefore, to be modified by the introduction of jatis and upajatis (castes and sub-castes) in order to accommodate thousands of permutations and combinations that had to be assimilated. To maintain their exclusivity, the brahmins encouraged the elaboration of the shudra varna. It is of interest to study such literature in connection with the origin of the Gurav. The typical brahmanical explanation links the Gurav to illicit sexual unions between fallen priests and shudra prostitutes or between brahmins and impure women (women who are menstruating or have given birth). In his History of Dharmashastra Kane refers to two mediaeval works that mention new castes: Shudrakamalakara and Jativiveka.⁴⁴ The *Shudrakamalakara*⁴⁵ states that

A Shiva-worshipper of the Pashupata sect is called a Jangam. If a son is born to a Shudra prostitute from a fallen Jangam, he is to be known as 'Bhasmankura'. His lot in life is to worship Shiva constantly. He should perform the 'Puja' of Shiva and (sacred thread) ceremony for King Shivaji, thus raising him to kshatriya status. He then crowned him King in 1674.

⁴³ Israel and Wagle, op. cit.

⁴⁴ P. V. Kane, History of the Dharmashastra (Pune, Govt. Oriental Series, Class B, no. 6, Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute, 1973), Vol. II, pt. 1, p. 102.

⁴⁵ The Shudrakamalakara also known as Shudradharmatatwaprakasha was written by Kamalakapandit in the late sixteenth century at Banares. An edition with a Marathi translation and extensive commentary was published in Bombay in 1910.

dispose of the 'Nirmalya'. He should live on offerings made to Shiva by other devotees. He should grow his hair long, cover himself with Bhasma (ash) and worship the Shivalinga. The betel leaves, rice, money, cows, farms etc that have been offered to Shiva by other devotees rightfully belong to the Bhasmankura.

The translator, Vamanshastri Islampurkar comments⁴⁶

(These Bhasmankuras) must be the ones that are the Gurav today. In all of the old Shiva temples throughout India, the traditional Pujaris are the Gurav. Of these, many are Lingayats. On the other hand, there are those who wear the sacred thread, shave the heads of widows, i.e. behave like Brahmins. Those Gurav who behave like Brahmins are probably Kund or Golaks.⁴⁷ Those Gurav who behave like Shudras are probably Bhasmankuras.

The second text, the Jativiveka, was written by a brahmin called Gopinath Pandit, in Pune in 1851,⁴⁸ and an index was prepared for it by Trymbak Pandit probably around the same time. While the index for Jativiveka gives the same story about the origin of the Gurav as the Shudrakamalakara, the text of the Jativiveka has another interesting story to tell. An alternative origin for the Gurav, according to the Jativiveka is as follows:

On the first day of her period a woman is called a Chandali. If as a result of the union of a woman in such a state with a Brahmin, a son is born, he is called a Devalaka. He should always play instruments such as the Mrudanga. He should wear white clothes, have three horizontal lines of sandal-paste on his forehead and he should wear a necklace made from the Rudraksha beads. The Devalaka should always be at the Shiva temple. Such is the origin of the Devalaka-Gurav.

One can clearly see that while grudgingly accepting the Gurav's right to the worship of Shiva and to the offerings made to Shiva by devotees - the brahmins are forbidden to partake of these — brahmin authors have made a ⁴⁶ V. Islampurkar (trans.), Shri Shudrakamalakara or Shudradharmatatwaprakasha (3rd ed., Bombay, Tukaram Javji, 1910).

⁴⁷ The son of a brahmin man and a brahmin woman through adultery is called a Kund; a Golak is the son of a brahmin man and a brahmin widow out of wedlock.

⁴⁸ Gopinath pandit, 'Jativivek' (handwritten manuscript at Vishwakosha Karyalaya, Wai, Maharashtra State, 1851). The Jativiveka also states that the origins of the Kayastha and the Shaiva-sonar (goldsmith) jatis are through intercourse by a brahmin with a woman on the second and third days of her menstrual period respectively. Hindu Shastras regard women as impure during their menstruation and forbid intercourse at this time. The birth of a lower caste from a woman in impure state would be a very logical outcome from the point of view of the brahmin author of the Jativiveka.

somewhat desperate attempt to down grade both jangams and the Gurav.⁴⁹ This grudging acceptance of the Gurav's right to Shiva's puja and material offerings to Shiva seems to prove unwittingly the Gurav's case for their brahmanical origin.

The Devalaka brahmin: conflict within the brahmin community

It has been mentioned earlier that the Shaiva-Gurav call themselves Devalakas (fallen brahmins). We have also seen that the Marathi brahmin, Gopinath Pandit, also saw it fit to call them Devalakas. Devalaka is a word which has been used since ancient times for an inferior brahmin who performed temple worship for remuneration. P. V. Kane, in his History of Dharmashastra writes:

It must be remembered that all Brahmanas were not priests. Similarly, all priests in all Indian temples and shrines are not Brahmanas. Temple priests are comparatively a later institution and in olden times they were looked down upon and are regarded as inferior Brahmanas even in modern times. Manu (III, 152) states that a Devalaka (a Brahmana who performed for remuneration service before the image in a temple) was unfit to be invited to a Shraddha or to officiate in sacrifices to gods if he continuously served for three years in this capacity. The ideal set before Brahmanas from very ancient times was of poverty, of plain living and high thinking, of abandoning the active pursuit of riches, of devotion to the study of Vedas and Shastras, of cherishing high culture and of handing down literature and cultural outlook.⁵⁰

In a paper entitled 'Orthodox Attitudes Towards Temple Service and Image Worship in Ancient India', Von Stietencron⁵¹ has discussed a possible schism within the brahmin clan that took place during the change from Vedic religion to temple worship. During this period, the vedic gods Indra, Varuna and Agni slowly lost their importance. On the other hand, the worship of the images of Shiva, Keshava (Vishnu) and Rama gained popularity. Stietencron suggests that it was the loss of clientele that forced a division among brahmins. Some acknowledged the temple cults and the new gods of the non-Aryans and tried to integrate them into brahminic religion. The more orthodox ones, however, resisted this change and applied to these former brahmins the term 'Devalaka' which had been used earlier to describe the shudra custodians of images. By this means, they indicated that in the eyes of the orthodox these Devalaka priests had fallen (Patitah) from the rank of brahmin to low caste shudra. They were thus unfit to eat in the company of honourable brahmins. In support of his claim, Stietencron quotes the Mahabharata, the Smritis and the Puranas.

⁴⁹ The term jangam (jangama) was applied originally to the Kalamukha Acharyas, who were, as seen earlier, the spiritual leaders of the Karnataka kings. The Lingayat sect adopted this term to describe their own spiritual leaders and priests. The term is still used in this way.

⁵⁰ Kane, op. cit., Vol. V, pt. 2, p. 936.

⁵¹ H. von Stietencron, 'Orthodox Attitudes towards Temple Service and Image Worship in Ancient India', Central Asiatic Journal, Vol. XXI (1977), p. 126. Temple priests, which include the Devalakas and Vaikhanas, have also been discussed by Colas at a recent conference. G. Colas, 'The Temple Priest: A Devalaka?', Proceedings of the XXXII International Congress for Asian and North African Studies (25-30 August 1986). Only a brief conference abstract was available at the time of writing this paper, hence a detailed analysis could not be made.

Stietencron's hypothesis concerning the division among brahmins and the use of the term Devalaka is accompanied by another hypothesis about how shudras could still worship the brahmin gods. Thus, he writes:

Part of them (the Brahmins) thought it wise to acknowledge temple cults along with the major new gods and tried to integrate them into the Brahminic religious system.

This required the brahmins to take over important functions in the temple service; it also implied the recognition of the fact that all castes from brahmins to shudras could worship the same god. Stietencron adds:

(The more orthodox) Brahmins were strictly against these concessions. They continued to consider temple service and image worship as inferior religious activities adequate only for Shudras and for low people bereft of proper knowledge. To them, the religious barriers which separated the three upper castes from the Shudras seemed absolutely indispensable. Full of contempt, they applied to them the same word 'Devalaka' which had been used for Shudra custodians of images before.

Stietencron's interpretation could go a long way towards explaining the paradox of Gurav temple worship in Maharashtra. But without conclusive historical evidence, it is impossible to know whether the Gurav are the fallen Devalaka brahmins of the distant past as claimed by them. These claims were made through the compilation of three Jatipuranas or caste history books by the Gurav at the turn of the twentieth century.

The *Devalaka-Kathamrit*⁵² was published in 1905 and was written in the Marathi language. The Sthula-Shaivagama,⁵³ which followed in 1909 was written in the Sanskrit language. Two years later, the Laghu-Shaivagama,⁵⁴ also in Marathi, appeared. Recently, a Gurav from Madhya Pradesh by the name of Omdatta Arya, has produced a booklet called Gaurav in Hindi⁵⁵ in which he has explored the Shivapurana story about the origin of the Devalaka brahmin in some detail.

⁵² Balshastris Upasani, Devalaka-Kathamrit, (ed.) N. M. Gurav (Bombay, Jagaditechhu Press, 1905).

⁵³ Jehurkar, Kashinathswami, Bhagwantswami, Sthula-Shaivagama (Solapur, Shri Dattaprasad Press, 1909).

⁵⁴ S. D. Pande, Langhushaivagama, (Nagpur, Motivilas Press, 1907).

⁵⁵ O. Arya, Gaurav (Ujjain, Kirti Printing Press, 1981).

All of the Jatipuranas mentioned above contain a structural element common to many other caste histories. In the true Puranic style, they describe (1) how their distant forebears committed a sin; (2) how this incurred the wrath of God; (3) the resulting curse which downgraded them to shudra status; (4) the expiation of the sin, and finally, (5) their social rehabilitation at a level lower than what they had before but higher than their present shudra status. In the modern period, this structural device enabled many a caste to lay claim to high status.

The above Jatipuranas narrate the same story about the mythical origin of the Shaiva-Gurav. This story is analysed by me elsewhere⁵⁶ and hence only a cursory treatment of it will be given here. The story is narrated in the forty-fourth chapter of the Jnansamhita of the Shivapurana,⁵⁷ and describes the origin of the Devalaka brahmin. The Devalaka is the son of Sudarshana and the grandson of the sage Dadhichi. Shiva curses Sudarshana for touching the Shivalinga on the auspicious Shivaratri day in an impure state brought about after engaging in sexual intercourse with his wife and not purifying himself by bathing. The version given by the Shivapurana and the three Jatipuranas differs from the version quoted by Enthoven (1920) and by Russell and Hira Lal (1975 reprint).

In the Shivapurana and the two Jatipuranas, Sudarshana and Dadhichi practice penance after the curse. The god, pleased with the penance, gives Sudarshana the sacred Shiva-gayatri mantra and the right to worship Shiva before everyone else and on every occasion. He also allows him to accept for his own use the offerings made by the other devotees to Shiva (Nirmalya). The god goes so far as to declare that unless a Devalaka is worshipped first, the god's puja will not be complete. On the other hand, in the accounts by Enthoven, Russell and Hira Lal, the infuriated god cursed Sudarshana to be a shudra but he softened later on to give him the first right to puja in spite of his shudra status. Since the Gurav claim to be Devalakas, they naturally say that the versions given by Enthoven and others have been deliberately changed in order to malign the Gurav. As seen earlier, the informants of Enthoven and of Russell and Hira Lal would have been brahmins and it would be hardly surprising if their accounts described the Gurav as a shudra. The brahmin accounts are, however, unable to explain the dichotomy between the Gurav's shudra status on one hand and his right to Shiva's puja before the brahmin on the other hand. The only way to reconcile these apparent contradictions is to recognise the brahmin origin of the Gurav.

⁵⁶ J. P. Bapat, 'The Gurav Jatipuranas', paper given at the A.S.A.A. Conference, Armidale, NSW, Australia (July 1992).

⁵⁷ The Shivamahapurana (Bombay, Khemraj Shrikrishnadas, Shri Venkateshwar Steam Press, 1896). The Jnansamhita is found only in the 1896 edition of this purana. The editions after this, including the current one, do not contain this samhita. The story of Devalaka appears in the 44th chapter of this samhita. For a detailed discussion of the Shivamahapurana and its samhitas, see R. C. Hazra, 'The Problems Relating to the Shiva-Purana', Our Heritage, Vol. 1 (1953), p. 46. See also L. Rocher, The Puranas (Wiesbaden, Otto Harrassowitz, 1986), p. 223; Pandit J. Mishra, Ashtadashapurana-darpan (Bombay, Khemraj Shrikrishnadas, Shri Venkateshwara Steam Press, 1939).

The ritual ancestry of the Gurav and the claims before the Shankaracharya

The 'Shastric' way to determine the ritual ancestry of the Gurav, as brahmins or whatever, is by defining what it is that qualifies a person to be called a brahmin and then to see if the Gurav meet these criteria. Life cycle rituals require all brahmins to be able to recite their Gotra Pravara, Shakha and Sutra.⁵⁸ Since early times, the ability to do this has been taken as the proof of the brahminic origin of a person.

All brahmins claim to be descendants of eight Vedic seers: Vishwamitra, Jamadagni, Bharadwaja, Gautama, Atri, Vasishtha, Kashyapa and Agastya.⁵⁹ These eight mythical ancestors are called 'Originators of Gotras' (clans) and the brahmins identify themselves as the progeny of one of these eight seers. Hence all brahmins belong to one of the eight Gotras. Pravaras are also ancestors, most probably the illustrious members of a Gotra. Thus one Gotra can have several Pravaras. Next in importance to the Gotras, Pravaras entered into domestic ceremonies and other ritual practices of the Vedic brahmins as a diacritical mark of a group (and of the individual members belonging to it).

During Vedic times a brahmin following the tradition of his own household, studied one of the four Vedas and identified with it in terms of the chants and mantras he would use for the ritual performances. He acquired his Vedic identity through the particular recession of the Veda he was required to follow. These family practices came to be identified as shakhas (branch of a tree). Finally, the sutras are ritual manuals prepared by the rishi (seer). The sutra of a brahmin family is named after the rishi whose manual of rituals is utilised by it in religious ceremonies.

Brahmin castes in Maharashtra are also classified according to the region of Maharashtra they inhabit. Thus the Konkanstha are those from the coastal areas; Deshastha are from hinterland, and Karade are those from the town of Karad and its surrounding region. Until recently, these groups were endogamous. Currently in Maharashtra, while every brahmin must in principle know his Gotra, Pravara and Veda identity, and does so in practice, only those who still act as priests know their sutra and shakha. Personal knowledge of one's Gotra, Pravara and Veda identity is still taken as the definitive proof of a person's brahminhood. Other varnas in Maharashtra do not possess a Gotra identity any more. In the performances of religious ceremonies for these groups, whenever the utterance of Gotra and Pravara identity is essential, the performing brahmin uses his own Gotra and Pravara.⁶⁰

⁵⁸ J. N. Bhattacharya, Hindu Castes and Sects (rep. Calcutta, Editions Indian, 1968), p. 22.

⁵⁹ Kane, op. cit., Vol. II, pt. 1, p. 480. Kane suggests that Gotras were acquired both by descent and by attachment.

If the claims of the Shaiva-Gurav to be brahmin temple priests are to be accepted, they would therefore be expected to know their Gotra, Pravara and Shakha identity if indeed they are brahmin temple priests. There is evidence to suggest that this certainly was the case when they met with the Shankaracharya of Shringeri Math.⁶¹ The meeting took place at Wai in Maharashtra in 1811 A.D. and the Gurav, as proof of their brahminhood, have published a detailed account of this meeting.⁶² Apparently, the Gurav were able to answer satisfactorily twenty-nine questions that the arbiter, spiritual leader, asked them. These involved information about the Gurav's Gotra, Pravara and Shakha identity. In answer to the Shankaracharya's questions, the Gurav claimed that they were brahmins and hence entitled to Vedokta (and not Puranokta) rituals and that they were Pashupatas and belonged to the Nath sect.⁶³ The Shankaracharya then declared the Gurav to be Shaiva brahmins and added that in his native state, Karnataka, similar Shaiva priests were called 'Gurukkul brahmins'.⁶⁴

The Shaiva-Gurav's real caste identity: some final thoughts

Are the Shaiva-Gurav brahmin, vaishyas or shudras? Apart from one reference,⁶⁵ I have not found any other mention of them being called vaishyas. Their inclusion among vaishyas, during the reign of Yadavas, if true, may have been due to their involvement in the business of selling flowers and leaf plates. There is no other vaishya function that they seem to have performed.

On the other hand, Marathi brahmins have always classed the Gurav as shudras. The *Leelacharitra*⁶⁶ (1283 A.D.) mentions a brahmin lady, Rupabai, ⁶⁰ Loc. cit.

⁶¹ The Shankaracharya of Shringeri, who lived somewhere around the 6th or 7th century A.D., was responsible for the re-establishment of Shaivism in India. He established four centres (mathas) in the four corners of India, to revive Hinduism, in particular, Shaivism. This tradition is still current and the spiritual leaders who occupy these seats are known as Shankaracharyas and are highly respected even in contemporary India. The seal of approval from the Shankaracharya is thus tantamount to universal acceptance within Hindu India.

⁶² K. B. Upadhye, Mahiti-Patruk (Solapur, January 1913). This information has been reproduced at various times by Shaiva-brahmin jati newspapers and magazines. See B. M. Jintikar (ed.), Shaiva-Samachara (15 April 1973).

⁶³ The Gurav went to the Shankaracharya in an attempt to challenge the 'shudra' label given to them by the Marathi brahmins. Thus, as early as 1811, there existed a dispute between the Shaiva brahmins and Marathi brahmins, long before the disputes precipitated by the British census of 1911.

⁶⁴ The Gurukkul is a caste of Shiva temple priest in Karnataka state. They are considered as brahmins, albeit, low ones.

⁶⁵ Verma, op. cit.

⁶⁶ Kolate, op. cit., (no. 424), p. 604.

who is asked to have a bath and thus purify herself for the sin of accepting a drink of water from a Gurav. Much later, during the reign of the Peshwas in the seventeenth century, there is mention of a brahmin being fined for attempting to teach Rudra chants to a jangam (spiritual leader of the Lingayat Gurav). The jangam, in this instance, faced the death penalty. Instead, all of his belongings including his house were confiscated and the jangam was driven out from the city. Another jangam, who was caught chanting the Rudra, was jailed.⁶⁷ What then does a caste of temple priests labelled as shudras do, to maintain their importance in the social hierarchy? It has only two alternatives: either accept the shudra label and then explain why it is that even as shudras they are allowed the special privilege of acting as temple priests in Marathi temples (this was done successfully in the non-brahmin Mathas in south India such as Dharmapuram),⁶⁸ or they can claim that their fallen caste status is due to a folly of one of their ancestors or that it is as a result of a deliberate attempt by vengeful brahmins to bring them down. The Gurav have resorted to the last alternative. They have always claimed noble ancestry from the sage Dadhichi. Also, they have blamed the brahmins for not accepting them into the brahmin varna. Scarcity of available material and an almost complete lack of an oral tradition on the part of the Gurav makes a definitive conclusion concerning the validity of these claims almost impossible. However, a lot of evidence, quite often in the form of seemingly unrelated morsels of information, points to the fact that the Shaiva-Gurav may in fact be fallen brahmins. The evidence can be summarised as follows:

1. The Gurav have successfully challenged their classification as shudras in civil law suits. During one such suit in 1938, the Gurav were able to get Nyayaratna Vinod, a respected Marathi brahmin pandit and scholar, to give evidence on their behalf that the Shaiva-Gurav were, in fact, brahmins. The magistrate accepted this argument and ruled in the favour of the Shaiva-Gurav.⁶⁹

Similarly in 1911, the official census at Bale in Sholapur district refused to accept the Shaiva-Gurav as brahmins. The matter went before the collector of the time who ruled that, 'If they so wished, the Gurav could write their caste as "Shaiva-Brahmins"'.⁷⁰

⁶⁷ G. S. Sardesai, The Social and Religious Matters under the Peshwas (1717-1729), Vol. 43, 'Selections from the Peshwa Daftar (Bombay Govt. Central Press, 1934), pp. 92, 94.

⁶⁸ K. I. Koppedrayar, 'Are Shudras entitled to ride in the palanquin?', Contributions to Indian Society, N.S. 25, 2 (1991), p. 154.

⁶⁹ M. Vinod, Aho saubhagyam (Pune, Siddhashrama Prakashan, 1984), p. 154. This autobiography of Maitreyi Vinod mentions that her husband, Nyayaratna Vinod, a well-known brahmin scholar, gave evidence on behalf of the Gurav in a law suit at Satara in 1938. The magistrate accepted his argument that the Shaiva-Gurav were brahmins.

2. Apart from the brahmins, other Marathi castes including the kshatriyas seem to accept the Gurav's authority as temple priests. The Gurav are also family priests to many castes.
3. There is very good evidence to suggest that not long ago at least some of the Gurav were well read in the Shastras and had a good knowledge of the Sanskrit language.⁷⁰ Most Shaiva-Gurav have a Gotra identity and many know their Veda, Pravara and Shakha.
4. As has already been mentioned, the Gurav have a threading ceremony, brahminic rituals like Garbhadana (the conception ritual) and marriage rituals very similar to Deshastha or Dravid brahmins.⁷¹ They are also strict vegetarians.
5. The Shaiva brahmins will accept food only from brahmins and Enthoven states that the brahmins 'smoke with the Gurav'.
6. In some of the most important shrines such as Vithala shrine at Pandharpur, the Ambabai shrine at Kolhapur, and all the major Shiva temples, the worship by the Gurav is an old practice. At Kolhapur, the brahmins actually share the worship with the Gurav on a rotational basis.
7. The brahmins in Maharashtra have accepted the right of the Gurav to perform the first puja in the morning and the last puja at night in all the Shiva shrines. Unless the Gurav has performed his first puja in the morning, the brahmin will not perform his Abhisheka (bathing the Shivalinga with sacred water while chanting the Rudra). Also, once the Gurav has performed his last puja at night, the brahmin will never enter the inner sanctum sanctorum of the temple.
8. Most importantly, the brahmins have accepted the Gurav's right to the Nirmalya, the offering to Shiva made by devotees. The brahmins thus will not touch the money, food and other items offered by the devotees.

Modern day Marathi brahmins argue that Shiva is a non-Aryan deity and hence they cannot accept gifts made to him. According to them, the Gurav who are shudras can ⁷⁰ A Gurav called Shende recently wrote to me that his grandfather used to perform both the Shivasandhya and the Vishnosandhya daily. He also had Agnihotra, the constant burning of ritual sacrificial fire.

⁷¹ Kelkar, op. cit.

accept the Nirmalaya.⁷² This argument, however, seems exaggerated because there are important Shiva shrines in Maharashtra (for example the temple of Trymbakeshwar, one of the famous Jyotirlingas in India) where brahmins do act as priests. Furthermore in other Shiva shrines once the Gurav has done his puja, the brahmin often performs 'Rudra-Abhisheka' which involves bathing the idol while chanting mantras from 'Shatarudriya', a prayer for rudra from the yajurveda.⁷³

9. Seetharamaiah⁷⁴ states that in Karnataka, the Goravas were Kalamukha priests who were held in high esteem in the courts of the Kannada Kings in the ninth and tenth centuries. Lorenzen⁷⁵ says that the Kalamukha Acharyas were highly learned people and their Mathas were centres of traditional Sanskrit learning. Their influence waned after the fourteenth century with the increased influence of Veera-Shaivism. While Seetharamaiah suggests that the Goravas have no connection with the Gurav, he offers no proof for his assertion. If then, the Gurav are in fact Goravas of the distant past, they may have been connected with the Kalamukha strongholds in Maharashtra such as Ardhapura, Nanded and Ganeshwadi. The Kalamukha influence in Maharashtra waned after the emergence of the Nath sect.⁷⁶ It will be remembered that the Gurav call themselves Nath-Panthi (belonging to the Nath sect) and it is reasonable to suggest that the Gurav switched their loyalties from the Kalamukha cult to the Nath cult.
10. In an interesting article which examines South Indian Shaivism, Brunner⁷⁷ has examined several Shaiva-agamas, the ritual texts of southern Shaivism, many of which predate the Aryan religion. Some of these texts differentiate between a Vipra — a Vedic brahmin and a Shaiva-brahmin. Brunner suggests that the Varna and Gotra system, which was absent in the Shaiva religion, may have been adopted by them after being absorbed into ⁷² Personal communication: interviews with many brahmin priests.

⁷³ On their part, the Gurav maintain that unless one is initiated in the traditional Shaivite rituals, one is not allowed to take the Nirmalya of Shiva. H. Brunner, 'De la Consommation du Nirmalya de Shiva', Journal Asiatique (1969). It is therefore the traditional Shaiva priests who have the right to do so.

⁷⁴ S. Seetharamaiah, 'Goravas of Karnataka', in Shrikanthika, [Dr S. Shrikantha Shastri Felicitation volume] (Mysore, Geetha Book House, 1973), p. 316.

⁷⁵ Lorenzen, op. cit., p. 115.

⁷⁶ For a discussion of the Nath and Kalmukha sects in Maharashtra, see K. D. Bhingarker, 'Nath Pantha and Shive', in Prasad, Shaivadaivat, Special Issue, Vol. 1, 24 (Aug. 1970), p. 31; M. R. Joshi, 'Maharashtrael Shaiva-sampradaya va Nathpanthacha Vistara', ibid., p. 25.

⁷⁷ Brunner, op. cit., the Aryan religion. The Shaiva priests would have then taken the name, 'Shaiva-brahmins'. While it is an extremely interesting theory, lack of evidence of any sort makes it impossible to connect the Gurav-priests to Vedic Shaiva brahmins. However, whatever their origin in the distant past, the history of the past seven hundred odd years points to their being fallen brahmins.

Tenuous as the above may seem, due to the lack of substantive evidence, these facts do support the hypothesis that the non-brahmin Gurav temple priests of western India are fallen brahmins. It is interesting to note that the Gurav-equivalents in the neighbouring states of Karnataka and Gujarat, the Gurukkul⁷⁸ and Tapodhans⁷⁹, are actually classed as brahmins by those societies, albeit, lower in status than all other brahmins. The Gurav say that some of their kind migrated to Gujarat and were named Tapodhan in that state.⁸⁰

If the claims of the Shaiva Gurav are true, then the phenomenon of low caste priests serving in the temples of Maharashtra is not a sign of cultural tolerance but rather an indication of how inflexible the Marathi brahmins were — for when the Gorava of Karnataka migrated into northern Maharashtra, they lost the undisputed brahminical status which they had in Karnataka. They never regained that status but were grudgingly given some stake in the temple rituals — presumably in the interest of social cohesion.

⁷⁸ Thurston and Rangachari, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 309.

⁷⁹ G. H. Desai, Bharuch Shaharno Itihas (Bharuch, Gnanodaya Printing Press, 1914), p. 127. See also S. Rajgor, Gujaratna Brahmanono Itihasa (Ahmedabad, Rajgor, B. S., 1987), p. 351; and Girijashankar Nirbhayaram (Bhatta), Tadpodhan Tatwaprakasha (Ahmedabad, Jnanodaya Electric Printing Press, 1932).

⁸⁰ Chhote Lall Sharma-Gaud, Saptakhandi Jati Nirnaya (Fulera (Jaipur), Hindu Dharma Varna Wyawastha Mandab, 1924), p. 323.

Asian Studies Review

Publication details, including instructions for authors and subscription information:

<http://www.tandfonline.com/loi/casr20>

A Jatipurana (clan-history myth) of the Gurav temple priests of Maharashtra

Jayant Bhalchandra Bapat ^a

^a Monash University

Published online: 27 Feb 2007.

To cite this article: Jayant Bhalchandra Bapat (1998) A Jatipurana (clan-history myth) of the Gurav temple priests of Maharashtra, Asian Studies Review, 22:1, 63-78, DOI: 10.1080/10357829808713187

To link to this article: <http://dx.doi.org/10.1080/10357829808713187>

PLEASE SCROLL DOWN FOR ARTICLE

Taylor & Francis makes every effort to ensure the accuracy of all the information (the "Content") contained in the publications on our platform. However, Taylor & Francis, our agents, and our licensors make no representations or warranties whatsoever as to the accuracy, completeness, or suitability for any purpose of the Content. Any opinions and views expressed in this publication are the opinions and views of the authors, and are not the views of or endorsed by Taylor & Francis. The accuracy of the Content should not be relied upon and should be independently verified with primary sources of information. Taylor and Francis shall not be liable for any losses, actions, claims, proceedings, demands, costs, expenses, damages, and other liabilities whatsoever or howsoever caused arising directly or indirectly in connection with, in relation to or arising out of the use of the Content.

This article may be used for research, teaching, and private study purposes. Any substantial or systematic reproduction, redistribution, reselling, loan, sub-licensing, systematic supply, or distribution in any form to anyone is expressly forbidden. Terms & Conditions of access and use can be found at <http://www.tandfonline.com/page/terms-and-conditions>

A JĀTIPURĀṆA (CLAN-HISTORY MYTH) OF THE GURAV TEMPLE PRIESTS OF MAHARASHTRA

JAYANT BHALCHANDRA BAPAT
Monash University

THE GURAV JĀTIPURĀṆAS

Purāṇic scholarship usually deals with the eighteen Mahāpurāṇas, the same number of secondary or Upa-Purāṇas and occasionally the Sthala or Kshetra-Purāṇas. This last category deals primarily with the religious history and celebration [Mahātmya] of holy places. However, I agree with Bailey who points out (Bailey 1995) that a purāṇic text, in addition to being a literary object, must also be considered as a cultural object that appears at a certain time to fulfil a cultural need during the historical development of Indian culture. Thus, from a sociological and cultural standpoint, one must add to this list an important fourth class, the Jātipurāṇas (Caste Purāṇas), which expressly trace the origin of a caste group from a mythological ancestor. These Purāṇas constitute a large body of literature relevant to particular caste groups. Typically in their accounts they span several centuries of narrated time, and although often of dubious historical merit as a record of the actual development of the caste, they can shed important light on the pressures within Hindu society to justify particular positions within the caste system. This aspect of the sociological significance of the Jātipurāṇas has largely been ignored in the literature, and as Rocher aptly points out, "they are far more important than our present knowledge of them" (Rocher 1986, 72). In spite of this statement, however, he devotes only one paragraph to Jātipurāṇas in his work on Purāṇas.

The Jātipurāṇas were composed primarily with a twofold purpose: to establish and to legitimate the placement of a caste group within a caste hierarchy (usually higher than their existing placement in the eyes of the significant others) and, secondly, to detail the exalted or even divine origin of their group.¹ They are thus cast in the traditional style of purāṇic composition. Almost all of them are composed in verse, and, in the Agama style, they are revealed by either a God or a Ṛṣi in the form of a dialogue between a seeker of knowledge and an expounder. In this paper, I wish to explore one such Jātipurāṇa written on behalf of a priestly community from Maharashtra who call themselves S'aiva-Brahmins or S'aiva-Gurav.

BACKGROUND TO JĀTIPURĀṆAS

The attempt to bring the social reality of jātis in line with the ideological notion of their creation from the four fold varṇa system through miscegenation is at least as old as the Manusmṛti. This reality was characterised by the existence of innumerable closed social groups defined by heredity, pursuit of profession, division of labour, ritual evaluation of lifestyle and occupation, access or denial of the jāti to the Vedas and so on. Manu utilised the concepts of miscegenation and hierarchy, i.e., anuloma (hypergamy) and pratiloma (hypogamy) to explain the diversities of his time. Ever since, hypogamy, which implies sexual transgression on the part of the female, and other types of sexual deviations from the norm, such as adultery or violation of the ritual rules of intercourse, have been used in Hindu social thought to explain the fall of a caste from a higher status. The thousands of resulting jātis and upa-jātis were termed castes and sub-castes by the Portuguese and the British [Portuguese: casta]. It must however be remembered that the separation and divide between the jātis quite often remained very vague and difficult; and, as Cohn points out (Cohn 1968), the jāti, like the varṇa, is “essentially a theoretical level of the Indian social system, of itself possessing no social reality”. Cohn’s assertion is supported by Silverberg who found that “much social interaction in the Indian peasant community is not merely, not even principally intercaste behaviour” (Silverberg 1959, 150). It is a well established fact that the caste hierarchy was far from being a rigid, die-cast entity. It could be said to be then (and now) in a state of dynamic equilibrium. The system did allow individual castes a measure of mobility. However, as Srinivas correctly notes, “there were only positional changes and the fundamental structure itself remained intact” (Srinivas 1967, 7).

These positional changes were precipitated by one or the other caste, for a variety of reasons. The Weberian equation of the interplay of politics, power and status played a dominant part. For example, the ruling classes, superior in political might, vied with the brahmins for higher social, if not ritual, status. Thus, as early as the reign of the Rashtrakutas in Maharashtra, the royalty formed a sub-caste for themselves amongst ks'atriyas called “Sat Ks'atriyas”, claimed—and apparently were held in—a status even higher than the brahmins (Altekar 1960, 309). Such caste mobility was of course politically determined between the brahmins and ks'atriyas; the literature abounds with such examples. Among the vais'yas and s'udra varṇa however, upward mobility vis-à-vis each other was an uphill battle. As soon as a caste saw an opportunity, it would make an effort to raise itself. The methods adopted by caste leaders were almost always the same. They would employ a learned and well-respected brahmin to look into their case and come up with a justification for raising their position in the caste hierarchy. To give authenticity to their claim, a powerful and well-to-do caste would go even further: it would commission the brahmin to compose a Jātipurāṇa for them. A brahmin could usually be found to undertake such a task, most often for a reward. Occasionally a king, on being approached by a caste, would commission brahmins to study the caste's claim. He would then give a ruling according to the advice received (Das 1968, 141; Hutton 1961, 94; Srinivas 1967, 95). There is no doubt that kings wielded substantial authority in the legitimisation of caste status. Quoting several examples, O'Malley notes that "The king issued marriage regulations for castes, he fixed the social rank of different sub-castes, he promoted members of one caste to another level and he degraded them to a lower" (O'Malley 1974, 56).

The eighteenth century saw the rule of the Peshwas in Maharashtra and Mughal rule in most other parts of India. There is evidence to suggest that both the Peshwas and the Moslem rulers maintained control over caste matters, the latter albeit indirectly (O'Malley 1974, 59). With the takeover by the British, and the consolidation of their legislative power, these functions were inherited by the British rulers. The British were reluctant, especially after the 1857 revolt, to interfere with the socio-religious matters of the Hindu population, but were often forced to do so. O'Malley (1974, 63) noted in 1932 that:

There is no official control of caste and no state interference with caste customs in British India. The Government follows a policy of non-intervention, for it is a fixed principle that it should not interfere with social laws and personal customs unless there is a general and unequivocal demand for reform on the part of the people themselves. Yet such is the force of the immemorial tradition that the castes expect the British Government to exercise the prerogative of the ancient Hindu kings by prescribing the social status of the castes. At each recurring census, the census authorities are inundated by memorials from different castes petitioning the Government to recognise their claim to a higher rank than they are actually accorded by the Hindu Community at large.

For the ease of administration, for introducing a fair and logical system of justice, and to fulfil their orientalist pursuit, the Imperial government in India embarked upon several courses of action. Their major initiatives were:

- 1) establishment of a central bureaucratic information gathering machine;

- 2) research into the origin, functioning and structure of the caste system with a view to simplifying the administration of the law of the land. Having noted that the law of the land was markedly different for different caste groups, this was a logical course for the British to embark upon;
- 3) undertaking of ethnographic research resulting in the production of caste histories;
- 4) introduction of a "Social Preference Scale" classification in the 1901 census which ranked the castes according to their social precedence.

The Imperial Government was of course expanding upon some of the measures already taken earlier by the East India Company. The ethnographers employed by the British attempted to simplify and rationalise the complexities of Indian society and in doing so, gave a disproportionate importance to caste-cluster as a level of the society. As Carroll puts it:

The ethnological monographs produced by the colonial rulers stimulated similar inquiries by the Indians. The Indian informants . . . went beyond their subsidiary role to compile their own monographs. The Western authorities drew upon these researches by the Indians, who in turn drew upon the Western authorities; the result was the production of a highly interrelated series of "Caste-histories" (Carroll 1978, 233).²

This course of action proved to be a threat to the delicate equilibrium of the caste system, albeit inadvertently. The fact that the British were now engaged in a continuous attempt to describe, define, interpret and categorise the social complexity of Indian society enhanced caste consciousness amongst all castes. This was the first time ever that the details of the castes and sub-castes within the population were being reduced to writing by an authority. Also, many caste groups saw, in this Manu-like attempt at defining caste hierarchy, an opportunity to elevate their own caste in the total system. To achieve this goal, Caste-Sabhas (Organisations) were rapidly formed which sometimes mounted legal challenges in secular courts against their particular placements in the caste structure. The newly educated amongst the middle and the low castes also researched mythology and caste histories, and wrote about their group or commissioned a brahmin to write Jātīpurāṇas to support their claims. The Jātīpurāṇas were by far the best means of mounting a challenge in the colonial period. They were written in the language of the S'astras and were written mostly by brahmins. Both these facts tended to give authenticity to a claim, because both the British and members of the indigenous population held the brahmins in high esteem. In the early period of the British Raj, they were often the only link between the British and the local population.

It can thus be seen that challenges to caste status in the form of petitions to authority (made preferably with the help of Jātipurāṇas) were concerted attempts, albeit from diverse and often opposing quarters, to recast the balance of the regional caste hierarchy. Many Jātipurāṇas appeared around AD 1900 in anticipation of the second census to be held a year later. The plots of all Jātipurāṇas almost invariably contain common structural elements. In the style of a Purāṇic narrative, a Jātipurāṇa describes:

- 1) the committing of a sin by the caste's distant forebears or the performance of any other behaviour deviating substantially from the norm to which the caste aspires;
- 2) incurring of the wrath of God or a Seer [Ṛṣi]
- 3) a resultant curse in the form of a downgrading to a lower (mostly to the s'udra) varṇa;
- 4) expiation of the sin;
- 5) the rehabilitation at a level lower than original but higher than its erstwhile status.

Employment of this plot structuring device in literature enabled many a caste to lay claim to an original high status and, although immediate success was not always achieved, the device enabled the caste to keep its claim alive so that it could be reactivated at a later date. The laying of a claim in this manner was itself a mark of both modernity and education and hence of status higher than that of other similar castes who had not yet done so. While many of these claims were fanciful, it appears that those of other castes, such as for example those of the S'aiva-Gurav, had a prima facie validity for having a high status in the distant past as suggested by the evidence they put forward in support of their claim.

The Gurav Jātipurāṇas, therefore, perhaps not surprisingly, tell us of the Gurav's erstwhile brahmin origin from Sudars'ana, son of the great sage Dadhici. Sudars'ana commits a sin and is cursed by S'iva. As a result of the curse, he loses his right to perform Vedic rituals. Dadhici worships S'iva on behalf of his sons and seeks redress. Pleased with Dadhici's devotion, S'iva appears before him and even though he is unable to take back the curse, gives Sudars'ana and his progeny exclusive rights to S'iva's pūjā. The S'aiva-Gurav claim to be the descendants of Sudars'ana.

THE S'AIVA-GURAV AND THEIR JĀTIPURĀṆAS

The Gurav act as temple priests mostly in the S'iva, Devi and Hanuman temples of Maharashtra. As I have explained elsewhere (Bapat 1993, 79), there are many different endogamous groups among the Gurav. Those who call themselves S'aiva-Gurav are considered by all Gurav and other castes to be the highest among themselves. It is the S'aiva-Gurav who have laid a claim to brahminhood and there are three Jātipurāṇas that support their claim. The first, Devalaka-Kathāmṛt was published in 1905, the second, Sthūla-S'aivāgama, in 1909 and finally the Laghu-S'aivagāma in 1907. The two latter works are mere compilations of chapters from various S'aivite texts compiled by the Gurav for their own communities. In this article I will therefore examine only the Devalaka Kathāmṛt.

The Devalaka Kathāmṛt

This Jātipurāṇa is written in Marathi verse. The printed text measures 13 cms × 9 cms and consists of five chapters comprising forty-three pages. The Purāṇa was published at the Jagaditecchu Press in Pune in 1905 and the title page states that it was "written by Balshastri Upasani, a brahmin well versed in the Vedas and S'astras³ according to the wishes of the late Martand Ramji Gurav Punekar and published by his son Nagesh Martand Gurav". The next page contains an invitation to all Gurav to advertise the book among Gurav brethren and to sell it to them. It advertises that the publishers also wish to put in print information about their daily rituals [Nityavidhi] and invites them to send details of such information. This invitation is dated 25 July 1905. Its oblique purpose was to obtain one more proof for the Gurav's brahminic identity. Daily rituals identical to those practised by the brahmins would add weight to the Gurav's claim to brahminhood. I have found no evidence of such work being published.

In the typical traditional style of evocation such a work demands, Upasanishastri devotes the first few pages of chapter one to invoking Ganes'a, the auspicious god, Sarasvati, the goddess of knowledge, and Vālmiki, the first poet-author [ādikavi] of the Rāmāyaṇa. He then goes on to say that the three of them appeared before him and blessed his work, thus adding one more proof to the authenticity of its content. On page six begins the replication of the typical Purāṇic scene: Vyasa and other sages are engaged in discourse in the Naimiś'a Forest when the sages plead with Vyasa to expound to them the greatness of a deity or to solve a difficult theological problem. Thus, the gathered devotees tell Upasanishastri that he is none other than their Suta⁴ and beg him to narrate to them tales of the greatness of S'iva. They then say to him:

When we visit a S'iva temple, we always see abnormal [viparita] practices there. Thus the first pūjā is always performed by the Gurav and S'iva and Gauri accept this pūjā. Can you therefore explain to us the reasons behind this mystery and also explain to us the genealogy of the Gurav?

Upasani replies that the great sage Vyasa⁵ himself explained the origin of the Gurav in the S'ivapurāṇa. He further adds that, according to him, the person described in Sanskrit by Vyasa as a Devalaka is none other than the present day Gurav. Here ends chapter one.

Chapter two starts with the formulaic description of the Naimiś'a Forest as an idyllic place, the abode of the great sages. The forest is full of fruit laden trees and countless shrubs with fragrant flowers. Thick smoke rising from the "Homa" sacrificial fires of the Ṛṣis has blackened the leaves of some of the trees. The Ṛṣis are sitting together with their disciples in the afternoon, some discussing S'astras and Nyāya, others giving lessons in grammar and in music. The Suta enters the scene and the Ṛṣis and brahmins, overwhelmed with joy, ask him to narrate the story of the devalaka. He replies that the story of the devalaka is sacred and the audience should therefore listen to it carefully. In chapters three and four he then narrates this story:

There was a great brahmin called Dadhici who knew all the four Vedas, six S'astras and eighteen Purāṇas. He was a great devotee of S'iva whom he worshipped day and night. Dadhici had a son called Sudars'ana and Sudars'ana's wife was called Dus'kulā.⁶ She was so named because she was born in a sinful family. One day Dadhici had to go to another town for a meeting with caste members. He therefore instructed Sudars'ana to perform the daily pūjā of S'iva in his absence. Sudars'ana naturally obeyed his father. Then the day of Sivarātri came and all S'iva devotees fasted on that day. However, due to his association with his wife and her evil influence, Sudars'ana had become polluted and he was therefore not scared of committing a sin.⁷ Thus, he performed the pūjā of S'iva on this auspicious day and went home. However, instead of fasting, he had dinner with his wife at night and then had intercourse with her as well. Next morning, he got up in a hurry and went to S'iva's temple without taking a bath. In that impure state, he performed S'iva's pūjā. S'iva was infuriated and appeared before Sudars'ana in his terrible form with five heads, and ten hands all holding shining armour. The fire of the destruction of the world poured out of his eyes. He kicked Sudars'ana and told him that there was no sinner greater than him. The god said that Sudars'ana had committed three unpardonable sins: consuming food on a sacred day instead of fasting, engaging in intercourse on such a day and finally, performing his pūjā without first taking the purificatory bath. For these sins, S'iva cursed Sudars'ana and turned him into a stone. The curse took immediate effect; Sudars'ana turned into a stone while Dus'kulā died instantly from grief. Sudars'ana was denied entry into heaven and returned to earth. Grief-stricken by his wife's death, he cremated her and cursed himself for being the one responsible for all the terrible happenings and that he was paying for his sins in his previous births.

Chapter four continues the story:

Having heard this terrible news, Dadhici returned home in a hurry and blamed Sudars'ana for inviting the wrath of S'iva. He then invoked S'iva and his consort Pārvati. He pleaded with them and said that since Sudars'ana was their son, they should therefore forgive him. Pleased with Dadhici's penance, Pārvati appeared before Dadhici and begged S'iva to forgive Sudars'ana. S'iva appeared before Sudars'ana and holding his hand, made Sudars'ana sit next to him.

S'iva then gave Sudars'ana the sacred thread with three strands and also initiated him in the very sacred S'iva-Gāyatri Mantra.⁸ He advised Sudars'ana to worship Gauri (Bhavāni, Pārvati) first and then perform the detailed sixteen part pūjā of S'iva.⁹ The god then gave Sudars'ana many boons and gave him the prime place among his devotees. He advised that the first worship of the day would be performed from then on by Sudars'ana (and his descendants) and by no one else. He also allowed Sudars'ana to appropriate for his own use the offerings of grain, cloth, ghee, etc. brought to the temple by other devotees. The god further stressed that no pūjā would be complete unless Sudars'ana said, "Let it be so". S'iva also insisted that on auspicious occasions there should be at least one Gurav¹⁰ among the brahmins who are fed, otherwise the deed would not be meritorious. S'iva then appointed Sudars'ana's four sons as religious mentors to the four corners of earth. He then explained the Dharma (of the Devalaka) to Sudars'ana. This consisted of 1) a ritual daily bath in a sacred river; 2) rigorous performance of the rituals; 3) putting a round sandalwood mark [tilaka] on the forehead;¹¹ and 4) performance of the S'ivasandhyā. S'iva said that Sudars'ana should perform the S'ivasandhyā three times a day, recite the S'iva-Gāyatri all the time and worship Pārvati before the worship of any other god. He also decreed that Sudars'ana must not recite mantras from the Vedas, and that he should respect brahmins and eat only vegetarian food.

The bar on reciting the Vedic Mantras was extended to Sudars'ana's progeny as well. S'iva said that, although the progeny of Sudars'ana had lost their vedic rites, they should worship him constantly and that he was giving a special name "Devalaka" (temple priest) to them. The god said that no one ought to perform his pūjā before a Devalaka did it. He decreed that a Devalaka must be respected whether he be pure or sinful. Those who fed brahmins in order to please S'iva or Pārvati ought to include at least one Devalaka amongst the invitees. When the Devalaka was satiated by the meal, then S'iva himself would be equally happy. Here ends chapter four.¹²

In the fifth and final chapter, the story of the great king Bhadrasen is told which affirms the new status of the Devalaka objectively:

Bhadrasen conquered the whole world. He remained, however, extremely kind to all his people and he was also a great devotee of S'iva. Pleased with his singular devotion, S'iva appeared before him and offered him whatever he wanted, including Indra's throne. Bhadrasen refused to ask for any material reward. However, he asked S'iva to grant him some means that would act as an indicator to show if Bhadrasen had fulfilled his daily rituals and duties. S'iva therefore gave Bhadrasen a special pennant and asked him to raise it every morning. If Bhadrasen performed his daily duties properly, then the pennant would fall to the ground. However, in spite of all his good deeds including feeding thousands of brahmins daily, the pennant remained upstanding. The saddened king did not know what to do. One day a Devalaka visited the king and was fed along with the brahmins. The pennant fell to the ground instantly. The brahmins then explained to the king that it was due to the very special meritorious deed of feeding a Devalaka that the pennant fell. They also explained to him that feeding even a crore (ten million) of brahmins was not much good unless a Devalaka was fed as well. They also stated that the right to his first pūjā of the day was given by S'iva himself to the Devalaka. After that event, Bhadrasen made sure that a Devalaka was properly fed and clothed every day.

To end the chapter and the Purāṇa, Upasanishastri says that this historical account of the Devalaka was narrated by the Suta to S'aunaka and other Ṛṣis, and that he, Upasanishastri, is now telling it to the gathered devotees. He says that just as S'iva and S'ankara are the two names of the same god, Ghata and Ghāgara are the two names for the same pot, S'arkarā and Sākhar are the two names for the same sugar, similarly, Devalaka and Gurav are the two names for the same people.

Upasani finally declares that those Gurav who read this Purāṇa everyday¹³ will be looked after by S'iva and will acquire a good family, wealth and happiness. The Purāṇa ends here.

THE DEVALAKA KATHĀMṚT: AN ANALYSIS

As Veena Das argues (Das 1967–68, 141), it is very rewarding to treat a Jātipurāṇa as a sociological resource. The best way to approach this problem in the case of the Devalaka Kathāmṛt is to pose a series of questions as follows:

- 1) What prompted the Gurav to write/commission this Purāṇa?
- 2) Is this Purāṇa authentic in terms of the accepted fictional social history of the Gurav? In what sense are “the facts” provided in them acceptable?
- 3) What is the logic of validation of this Purāṇa used by the Gurav?
- 4) Has the acquisition of this Purāṇa by the Gurav had the desired effect in raising the status of the Gurav community?
- 5) Do other castes accept the Gurav claim?

I shall attempt to answer these questions in light of the available background information about the status of the S’aiva-Gurav in Marathi society. I will begin with the second question, as it relates directly to the subject of the legitimisation of the Gurav as a caste and also throws light on the logic of validation of this Purāṇa.

Although a Jātipurāṇa is a sacred text, it is designed to fulfil the cultural aspirations and needs of the group of people who are its subject. These people would then take the myths conveyed in this Purāṇa as evidence of their caste status so as to submit their claims of belonging to a particular earlier caste, invariably higher in status than their erstwhile position. In other words, the Jātipurāṇa serves as a strong statement of intention to lodge such a claim on the part of the community involved. For it to attain such a position, one of the major criteria the Jātipurāṇa must fulfil is that it must appear authentic in terms of convergence with the traditionally sanctioned yet fictional social history found in the Purāṇa, and it must be taken as part of the caste Paramparā.

The Devalaka Kathāmṛt was authored by a brahmin, Upasanishastri. His work shows all the hallmarks of a classical Purāṇa. As tradition demanded, Upasani sought to prove, first of all, that the Purāṇa was authentic in terms of the Purāṇic tradition. In order to do so, he linked his work directly to an ancient text like the S’ivapurāṇa, thus bringing sanction through tradition [paramparā] to his work. It also made his work as authentic as the S’ivapurāṇa. He was also able to model his work stylistically on the S’ivapurāṇa story, claiming that whatever he had to say was not at all new since it had appeared in the S’astras before and that he was thus a mere mortal who was ordered by god to produce the work. Hence his claim that Ganes’a, Sarasvati, the goddess of knowledge, and Vālmiki, the author of the Rāmāyaṇa, appeared before him and sanctioned his work. As the formula demanded humility of all mortal authors, Upasani said that, “he knew that as an author he was most inferior but he was also convinced that god would forgive him for his transgression.” This tendency is to be understood in terms of “Canons of legitimisation in traditional Sanskritic learning” (Das 1967–68, 152). Later authors try to graft their work onto celebrated older authors in order to make their own words appear authentic.

Replication of archaic forms of literature is another important device that Upasani uses in the process of legitimisation. He thus opens up with salutations to Ganes’a, Sarasvati and Vālmiki.¹⁴ The narrative then proceeds in the classical purāṇic style. As the third device in the legitimisation process, the Devalaka appears as the ancient temple priest and the story is woven around the Devalaka myth in the S’ivapurāṇa. The myth must now explain, why, in spite of his s’udra ways, the Gurav is a brahmin. Hence the story of Sudars’ana and S’iva’s curse. The restoration of Sudars’ana as S’iva’s premier devotee comes at the expense of the loss of the right to Vedic mantras, an expiation for the sin. Being a select devotee, Sudars’ana (and hence the Gurav) is allowed to keep for his own use the offerings made by other devotees to S’iva. Thus a justification is created for the Gurav to accept money and other gifts for his services. This introduces a different form of legitimisation than the two discussed above. The legitimisation is attempted here through arguments made in a myth, whereas the previous devices sought to legitimise the Gurav through broad appeal to tradition. As Das would put it (Das 1967–68, 151), the myth that the Gurav wish to contend may be syllogistically summarised as follows:

- 1) All brahmins have a particular style of sacred life;
- 2) the Gurav do not have this style;
- 3) therefore they are not brahmins;
- 4) the Gurav fell into non-brahmin ways due to a sin committed by their ancestor Sudars’ana;
- 5) expiation followed and the Gurav were given exclusive rights to S’iva’s pūjā and were also allowed to keep for their own use the offerings to S’iva made by other devotees;
- 6) therefore, although the right to Vedic rites has been taken away, the Gurav are really brahmins.

This brings me to the fourth question of whether the acquisition of the Purāṇa had the desired effect for the Gurav? In other words, has it arguably raised the status of the Gurav? There is some evidence to believe that the argument is accepted by both parties as an interim measure, a contention. The outcome is thus a compromise, not a solution. The Gurav remains a “select devotee” but does not rise in caste status. The brahmin dare not enter the sanctum sanctorum until the Gurav has done his first pūjā in the morning. And although he is clearly unhappy and jealous of the Gurav’s daily income, he has never challenged it. The brahmin on the other hand refuses to entertain the Gurav's claim to brahmin varṇa.¹⁵ One thus deals with two separate categories and the conflict is dissolved but not resolved. The Gurav accept the status quo not only because they have obtained official sanction for the use of the offerings made to S'iva but also because they have reserved the right to being the exclusive Pujāris in S'iva temples. Furthermore, they have kept their claim to brahminhood alive. The brahmins accept it, albeit grudgingly, because they have succeeded in keeping the Gurav out of the elite brahmin class. And although the partial success of the Gurav in achieving his goal must be attributed to several factors, the Jātipurāṇas must account for a substantial proportion of it.

On formal bureaucratic and religious levels, the S'aiva-Gurav have been far more successful and they have been able to appropriate the nomenclature of S'aiva brahmins. This can be seen from the fact that when the S'ankarācārya of S'ringeri Math came to the town of Wai in Maharashtra in 1811 he accepted their claim to brahminhood after discussion with the Gurav community there (Upadhye 1913). However, it is difficult to ascertain what precise role the above Purāṇa played in raising their status. I have little doubt that at the very least, it would have united the S'aiva-Gurav together in their disputes over status with the colonial bureaucracy and the brahmins. Thus in 1911, in a dispute before the collector of Solapur district, the Gurav were allowed to write their caste as "S'aiva brahmins", albeit as a compromise.¹⁶ Also, in a law suit in 1938, the Gurav were able to get Nyayaratna Vinod, a well known Marathi brahmin pandit and scholar to give evidence in court on their behalf that the S'aiva-Gurav were in fact brahmin. Vinod is said to have spent several weeks studying S'astras and Purāṇas before he came to this conclusion (Vinod 1984, 154).

It must however be remembered that the brahmins of Maharashtra have never taken the Gurav's claim to brahminhood seriously and such determination on the official level has made no difference to the treatment meted out to the Gurav by the brahmins at the societal level. While in other parts of India where S'aivite temple priests are considered to be lower-class brahmins, the Marathi brahmins have always considered the Gurav to be a s'udra. This is because the former generally quote a Vedic reference (Israel 1987, 145) whenever their exclusivity and status are challenged, and declare that in the Kali age, the ks'atriyas and vais'yas ceased to exist and thus only two varṇas remained: the brahmins and the s'udras. Not being accepted as brahmins, the Gurav are regarded as s'udras. Therefore, when the British sought to formalise the varṇa and jāti identity for each group within Hinduism through the 1901 census, the Gurav, like many other castes, saw it as an opportunity to raise themselves in the varṇa hierarchy. The fact that they firmly believed that they were brahmins—and also that they had a number of historical facts on their side—added weight to their claim. Part of the answer to question one regarding what prompted the Gurav to produce these Jātipurāṇas is now patently obvious: the desire of the Gurav to challenge their placement into the s'udra varṇa and to lay claim to belonging to the brahmin varṇa. However, it appears that the S'aiva Gurav had two other major concerns. These were: firstly, the need to justify their lack of education in general and lack of knowledge of Sanskrit and the S'astras in particular; and secondly, the need to show their superiority over the Lingāyats [Viras'aivas] who had taken over the priestly functions in many important S'iva shrines in Maharashtra. The modern day Gurav are painfully aware of their lack of education and lack of knowledge of S'astras. They are, therefore, at pains to point out that their forebears were generally well read and educated. What better examples of this can one find than the two Jātipurāṇas, Sthūls'aivāgama and Laghus'aivāgama, produced by two members of their own community? That both authors were able to peruse Sanskrit literature at length, interpret it and provide a detailed commentary, would in itself have proven the truth of their claims. Once again, no s'udras could have done this as they were prohibited from learning the divine language.¹⁷ Also, the father of the author of the Sthūls'aivāgama, Bhagawanstswami Jehurkar held the title of "Vedamurti" (one who is the image of Vedas), a title used to refer to one with a deep knowledge of the Vedas. His title of "Swami" suggests that he was a Sanyasin and that he also stayed in a Math. Similarly, a present day Gurav from Madhya Pradesh by the name of Omdatta Arya has written a book entitled Gaurav in Hindi (Arya 1981). This book also deals with the Sudars'ana myth. Omdatta's guru and father was a well-respected Gurav who became a Sanyasin in his old age.

EPILOGUE

Although acting as temple priests may be their "right" as far as the Gurav are concerned, to the other brahmins it has always been paid temple service. The Devalaka brahmin, claimed by the Gurav as their ancestor, appears even at the time of the Manusmṛiti (Jha 1939) as a brahmin of lower standing because he performs temple service for money. To the brahmins this is against the brahmin "Dharma" of avoiding contractual payment of any kind for religious services performed. Brahmins have always differentiated between the Daks'inā they receive for performing rituals and the regular income of the temple priest. The Daks'inā is an honorarium which also imparts merit [puṇya] to the host. The amount of Daks'ina can vary considerably depending on the financial position and wishes of the donor. As against this, the temple priest receives a regular income and orthodox brahmins have frowned upon this. Since the Gurav as temple priests do not observe this brahmin "Dharma", they are non-brahmins and hence s'udras to the Marathi brahmins. All over India, the lower status of the temple priest has been a point of great debate and as stated earlier, Indologists such as Kane, Stietenkron, Fuller and Appadorai have suggested various explanations for the phenomenon. The above differentiation based on the Dharma of the brahmin and that of the s'udra is one such explanation.

It is significant to note that the Gurav are not jockeying for a superior position vis-à-vis any other caste. They are simply ascertaining their priestly brahmin status. And while many Gurav claims to brahminhood arose just prior to the time of the 1911 Indian census, the Gurav attempts to establish their brahmin status, such as their claim before the S'ankarācārya in 1811, predate the census by at least a hundred years. The ritual awareness and assertiveness of the Gurav is certainly pre-British. Another point worth noting about the Gurav claim of 1811 before the S'ankarācārya is that they chose to go to him rather than the state, in this instance, the Peshwa. The Peshwas were brahmins and it would therefore have been difficult to approach them. It is unlikely that they would have entertained the Gurav claim.

NOTES

¹I use the words jāti and caste interchangeably in this paper.

²In a scathing attack on Herbert Risley, the well known British ethnographer who published such complete caste histories in his "People of India", Ronald Inden remarks, "previous accounts of castes had been drawn from texts composed by the self-serving Brahmins or had been anecdotal, penned by Western travellers, missionaries or revenue-collectors. Now we were to have fully systemic and scientific, that is, quantitative knowledge of India's essence" (Inden 1990, 58–59).

³*Vedas'āstrasampanna* is a title bestowed upon a brahmin who has learned the four Vedas and six S'astras rigorously.

⁴As early as Vedic times, sutas represent a class of people who are brahmins born out of Pratiloma (hypogamous) unions (Manusmṛti 10:17). The Padmapurāṇa says that the main duty of sutas is to sing praises of great kings and construct genealogies of gods, Ṛṣis and great kings (Padmapurāṇa: 1:1:28).

⁵The great mythical sage Vyasa is claimed to be the originator of all the eighteen main Purāṇas. See Mahāpurāṇas.

⁶In the Devalaka myth in the S'ivapurāṇa and in all three Gurav Jātipurāṇas, Dus'kulā has been portrayed as the instigator of the sin of having intercourse on a holy day. Dus'kulā is not a name that any parents would choose for their daughter. Her name therefore is generic and signifies a sinful woman. Laying the blame on her is a device by which the authors keep the blame away from Sudars'ana. It also reflects on the society of the time when women were considered inferior, polluting and inauspicious. (Dus'kulā means "one of an evil family".)

⁷Upasani comments here that, "As it is, women are inauspicious and polluted. On top of this, Dus'kulā came from a sinful family. It was therefore hardly surprising that Dus'kulā's husband Sudars'ana would entertain sinful thoughts as well". Devalaka Kathāmṛt.

⁸The S'iva-Gāyatri Mantra is Om Namaḥ S'ivāya. The Vedic Mantra given to the Brahmins at the Sacred Thread Ceremony, the Upanayana, is the Gāyatri Mantra addressed to Savitr, the sun god. Neither the S'ivapurāṇa nor the Gurav Jātipurāṇas explain why Sudars'ana, the son of the brahmin Ṛṣi Dadhici, got the S'iva-Gāyatri Mantra. The Vedic Gāyatri is also a metre. Siva-Gāyatri is chantable but is not in the Vedic metre.

⁹*Sodas'opacāra Pūjā* is the complete sixteen-part worship that can be offered to any god. See Gudrun Bmhemann 1988.

¹⁰It is significant to see that the word "Gurav" appears only in the Gurav Jātipurāṇas, the S'ivapurāṇa mentions only the Devalaka (temple priest). As the Gurav are the present temple priests, they claim to be descendants of Sudars'ana, and that they made the change from Devalaka to Gurav. The point is that the Maharashtrian Gurav do need to bridge the gap between themselves and the Purāṇic Devalaka.

¹¹The brahmins who worship Viṣṇu put three vertical lines on their foreheads, the S'aivites put the tripundra mark (three horizontal lines) on their foreheads, whereas the Gurav put a tilaka, a circular dot, on their foreheads. Neither the S'ivapurāṇa nor the Gurav Jātipurāṇas explain why the S'iva temple priest has to be different from the other brahmins in this diacritical mark.

¹²Each chapter of this Jātipurāṇa ends as follows: "Those who are known as Devalakas in the Sanskrit language are without doubt the Gurav (of the present day). Let everyone hear this biography of them. It is dedicated to S'iva, Sāmbasadās'iva". Devalaka Kathamṛt, ch. 1, p. 8, verse 41; ch. 2, p. 14, verse 26; ch. 3, p. 20, verse 28; ch. 4, p. 29, verse 45 and ch. 5, p. 43, verse 66.

¹³Few modern day Gurav seem even to know about the existence of this Purāṇa, let alone read it daily.

¹⁴The choice of Vālmiki instead of Vyasa is interesting. Vālmiki, the author of the Rāmāyāna, came from a low caste. There is a caste that claims to be Vālmiki-Brahmins who perform the rites of the untouchables.

¹⁵I attended a religious festival at a S'iva temple in Satara, Maharashtra State, in January 1992. At the conclusion of the festival there was a feast at which the Gurav and his family were not allowed to eat alongside the brahmins. As the custom dictated, they were asked to bring their own utensils and food was transferred into these from above, without contact by the brahmin cooks. The brahmins would not even touch the utensils. The Gurav and his family then helped themselves and had to sit together in one corner, well away from the brahmins.

¹⁶The census officials had included the Gurav as s'udras. The Gurav challenged this classification and the matter went before the collector. Upon hearing the Gurav claim, the collector made the above determination.

¹⁷Except for the brahmin and ks'atriya men, women and the lower castes were not allowed to learn and speak Sanskrit. They could only use Prakṛt. This practice is evident in Sanskrit literature, in the plays of Kalidasa, for example, where even the queen can speak only in Prakṛt.

¹⁸I have discussed this aspect of the Gurav-Lingayat interaction at some length in an extensive treatment of Gurav Jātipurāṇas soon to be published in the International Journal of Hindu Studies.

REFERENCES

Altekar, A. S. [1960] 1982. The Rashtrakutas. In The Early History of the Deccan, vol. 1, ed. G. Yazdani. Reprint, New Delhi: Oriental Book Reprint Corporation.

- Appadorai, Arjuna. 1983. The puzzling status of the Brahmin temple priest in Hindu India. South Asian Anthropologist 4:43–52.
- Arya, Omdatta. 1981. Gaurav (in Hindi). Ujjain: Kirti Printing Press.
- Bailey, G. M. 1995. Ganes'purāṇa, vol. 1 of Upāsanākhanda. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz.
- Bapat, J. B. 1993. The Gurav temple priests of Maharashtra. South Asia 16 (special issue): 79–100.
- Carroll, Lucy. 1978. Colonial perception of Hindu society and the emergence of caste associations. Journal of Asian Studies 37:233–50.
- Cohn, B. S. 1968. Notes on the history of the study of Indian society and culture. Structure and Change in Indian Society, ed. M. Singer and B. S. Cohn: 3–28. Chicago: Aldin.
- Das, Veena. 1967–68. A sociological approach to the caste Purāṇas: a case study. Sociological Bulletin 16–17:141–64.
- Fuller, C. J. 1984. Servants of the Goddess. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gudrun Bmhemann. 1988. Puja, A Study in Smarta Ritual. Leiden: E. J. Brill; Vienna: Gerold & Co.
- Hutton, J. H. 1963. Caste In India. London: Oxford University Press.
- Inden, Ronald. 1990. Imagining India. Oxford: Basil Blackwell.
- Jha, Ganganatha, ed. 1939. Manu-smṛti. Allahabad: Indian Press.
- Kane, P. V. n.d. History of Dharmas'astras, vol. 2, parts 1–2. Poona: Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute.
- Milton, Israel, and N. K. Wagle. 1987. Religion and Society in Maharashtra. Toronto: Centre for South Asian Studies, University of Toronto.
- O'Malley, L. S. S. [1932] 1974. Indian Caste Customs. Reprint. Delhi: Vikas Publishing.
- Rocher, Ludo. 1986. The Purāṇas. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz.
- Silverberg, J. 1959. Caste ascribed "status" versus caste irrelevant roles. Man in India 39:150.
- Srinivas, M. N. 1967. Social Change in Modern India. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.
- S'ri S'udrakamalākara or S'udradharmatatvaprakās'a. 1910 3d edition. Translated by Vamanshastri Islampurkar. Bombay: Tukaram Javji.
- Upadhye, Kashinath Bhagwant. 1913. Mahiti Patrak. Solapur: K. B. Upadhye. Brochure published for the Gurav Community.
- Vinod, Maitreyi. 1984. Aho Saubhāgyam. Pune: Siddhashrama Prakashan.
- Von Stietenron, Heinrich. 1977. Orthodox attitudes towards temple service and image worship in ancient India. Central Asiatic Journal 31:126–38.

The Jātipurāṇas of the Gurava temple priests of Maharashtra

Jayant Bhalchandra Bapat

Purāṇic scholarship has dealt extensively with the eighteen Mahāpurāṇas and eighteen related subordinate texts known as Upapurāṇas and occasionally with the Sthālapurāṇas. However, as Greg Bailey (1995: 3) argues, a Purāṇic text, in addition to being a literary object, needs to be considered as a cultural object that appears at a certain time to fulfil a need during the historical development of Hindu culture. From a sociocultural perspective, one must add to the list of Purāṇas an important fourth class of literature, the Jātipurāṇas. These were composed to provide a genealogical account connecting caste groups to a mythological ancestor. These accounts typically span several centuries of narrated time, and although they are often of dubious historical merit as a record of the actual rise or development of a caste, they do give some insight into the pressures within Hindu society to justify particular positions within the caste system. This aspect of the sociological significance of the Jātipurāṇas has largely been ignored in the literature, and, as Ludo Rocher aptly points out, 'they are far more important than our present knowledge of them' (1986: 72). Rocher, though, devotes only one paragraph to the Jātipurāṇas in his work on the Purāṇas.

The Jātipurāṇas are composed primarily with a twofold purpose: to establish and render legitimate the claim of a caste group within a regional (or even a pan-Indian) caste hierarchy to a status usually higher than its existing placement; and to detail the exalted, or at times divine, origin of that group.¹ Although called Purāṇas, the Jātipurāṇas do not necessarily contain the pañcalakṣaṇa (the 'five topics') that is the defining characteristic of a Purāṇa (Bailey 1995: 3). Even so, they conform to the overall purpose of the Purāṇas in several ways. They teach ethical behavior and are concerned with transgressions and merits, heavenly rewards and (severe) punishments. They are, however, not concerned with the word, as are the darśanas (systems of theology), or with rasa (aesthetic experience), as in kāvya (classical poetry).

The Jātipurāṇas also pattern the Purāṇas in their narrative structure. Their prologue is Āgamic in form, in that the narration is ‘a revelation either by a god or a ṛṣi’ for the good of the people at large and that the actual composer is either a sūta (bard) or a mortal being who retells the content. The Jātipurāṇas are invariably ākhyānas or upākhyānas, that is, stories which may be told in verse. They often begin with salutations to the gods or ṛṣis (seers) and, in the end, may contain a māhātmya glorifying the Purāṇa. They may also be in prose, written as an argument or a dialogue between the principle narrator (ṛṣi, sūta, or paṇḍita) and his audience or between the actual composer and his listeners.

The narrative tendency may also be to divide the story (kathā) into adhyāyas (chapters) with formulaic beginnings and ends. The aim of the narrative structure is to make the Jātipurāṇa resemble a proper Purāṇa or a work of high religious value so that it may seem authentic, believable, and paramparic (sanctioned by tradition). For this purpose, a Jātipurāṇa may be tied through context, content, and references to an existing Purāṇa. In order to understand why various jātis resorted to producing the Jātipurāṇas, we must examine the forces that propelled them to do so. This is best illuminated in relation to the social mobility of jātis.

JĀTIS AND SOCIAL MOBILITY

The attempt to bring the social reality of jātis in line with the ideological notion of their creation from the fourfold varṇa system through miscegenation is at least as old as the Manusmṛti. Throughout Indian history, the social reality has been characterized by the existence of innumerable closed social groups defined by heredity, the pursuit of a hereditary profession organized through a division of labor, the ritual evaluation of lifestyle and occupation, access or denial of the jāti to the Vedas, and so on. Manu utilized the concepts of miscegenation and caste hierarchy (anuloma or hypergamy and pratiloma or hypogamy) to explain the social diversities of his time. Since then, hypogamy has also been used in social practice to explain the fall of a caste member from a high status. The thousands of resulting jātis and upajātis found in situ, from the seventeenth to the twentieth centuries, came to be known as castes and subcastes by the Portuguese and the British. It must be remembered, however, that the line of demarcation between the jātis is always vague and difficult to discern. Bernard Cohn points out that the jāti, like the varṇa, is ‘essentially a theoretical level of the Indian social system, of itself possessing no social reality' (1968: 24). Caste hierarchy is far from being a rigid institution. Caste has always existed in a state of dynamic equilibrium, allowing individual castes a measure of mobility. However, as M. N. Srinivas correctly notes, 'these were only positional changes and the fundamental structure itself remained intact' (1967: 7).

Positional changes were precipitated by a caste for a variety of reasons. The Weberian equation of the interplay of politics, power, and status may help us to understand the Indian dynamic. For example, Kṣatriyas, the ruling classes, vied with the Brāhmaṇas for higher social, if not ritual, status. Thus, as early as the reign of the Rāṣṭrakūṭas in Maharashtra, the royalty formed a subcaste called Sat Kṣatriyas for themselves among other Kṣatriyas, and they claimed and apparently enjoyed a higher status than the Brāhmaṇas (Altekar 1982: 309). Such a politically determined status competition existed only between the Brāhmaṇas and the ruling Kṣatriyas. Other Kṣatriyas remained below Brāhmaṇas. Upward mobility has been a constant but difficult battle for the last two or three centuries among the Vaiśya and Śūdra varṇas. At every opportunity the lower castes would make an effort to raise themselves. One of the methods adopted by caste leaders was to employ a learned and well-respected Brāhmaṇa to research their past and to find justification for the elevation of their position in the caste hierarchy. To authenticate their claim, a powerful and well-to-do caste might go even further: It could commission a Brāhmaṇa to compose a Jātipurāṇa for them. (A Brāhmaṇa could be found to undertake such a task generally for a reward.) Sometimes a king (approached by a caste) would commission Brāhmaṇas to study the caste's claim. He would then give a ruling according to the advice received (Das 1967–68; see also Hutton 1963: 194; Srinivas 1967: 95). There can be no doubt that kings wielded substantial authority in the legitimization of caste status. Citing several examples, L. S. S. O'Malley notes that 'the king issued marriage regulations for castes, he fixed the social rank of different subcastes, he promoted members of one caste to another level and he degraded them to a lower' (1974: 56).

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT AND SOCIAL STATUS IN MAHARASHTRA

The eighteenth century saw the rule of the Peśvās in Maharashtra and the Mughal rule in most other parts of North India. There is evidence to suggest that both the Peśvās and the Muslim rulers maintained control over caste matters, the latter though indirectly (O'Malley 1974: 59). With the takeover by the British and the consolidation of their legislative power, these functions were inherited by the British rulers. The British were reluctant, especially after the 1857 revolt, to interfere with the socioreligious matters of the Hindu population, but they were often forced to do so. O'Malley noted in 1932 that:

There is no official control of caste and no state interference with caste customs in British India. The Government follows a policy of non-intervention, for it is a fixed principle that it should not interfere with social laws and personal customs unless there is a general and unequivocal demand for reform on the part of the people themselves. Yet such is the force of the immemorial tradition that the castes expect the British Government to exercise the prerogative of the ancient Hindu kings by prescribing the social status of the caste. At each recurring census, the census authorities are inundated by memorials from different castes petitioning the Government to recognise their claim to a higher rank than they are actually accorded by the Hindu Community at large (1974: 63).

To facilitate administration, to introduce a fair and logical system of justice, and to fulfil their own Orientalist pursuit, the Imperial government in India embarked upon several courses of action. The major initiatives were: to establish a central bureaucratic information-gathering service; to undertake research into the origin, function, and structure of the caste system with a view to simplify the administration of civil law. Having noted that the Hindu civil customary practices were markedly different for different caste groups, the British government embarked upon creating a corpus of knowledge about caste customs; to undertake ethnographic research resulting in the production of caste histories; to generate a Hindu civil law code from scriptures and localize caste tradition enshrined as legal precedents and by legislation; and to introduce a 'Social Preference Scale classification' in the 1901 census that ranked the castes according to their social precedence.

The Imperial government, after 1858, expanded upon some of the measures already begun by the East India Company. The ethnographers employed by the British attempted to simplify and rationalize the complexities of Indian society, and, in so doing, they gave disproportionate importance to the caste-cluster as the basic organizational level of Hindu society. Max Weber notes:

It is perhaps impossible to determine the rank order of the castes; it is contested and subject to change. An attempt was made in 1901 by the British census to settle this rank order once and for all. It was not repeated; the excitement and discontent that resulted was out of all proportion to the intended result. The attempt to classify castes set off a signal for competitive demands by the castes for social rank and the procurement of historical proofs to support their claims. It led to remonstrances and protests of all kinds and called forth a considerable, and partly instructive, literature. Castes of questionable rank sought to exploit the census for stabilising their position and used the census authorities as one census expert put it, 'as a kind of herald's office.' Amazing claims of new rank were made (1958: 47).

Lucy Carroll goes further:

The ethnological monographs produced by the colonial rulers stimulated similar inquiries by the Indians. The Indian informants went beyond their subsidiary role to compile their own monographs. The Western authorities drew upon these researches by the Indians, who, in turn, drew upon the Western authorities; the result was the production of a highly interrelated series of caste-histories (1978: 237).

Peter van der Veer echoes Carroll's line of thinking:

The idea that the caste is the basis of the Indian social order and that to be a Hindu is to be a member of a caste became an axiom in the British period. What probably happened during that period was probably a process of caste formation and more rigid systematization due to administrative and ideological pressures from the colonial system which reminds us of the so-called 'secondary tribalization' in Africa (1989: 53).

This course of action, though inadvertently, proved to be a threat to the delicate equilibrium of the caste system. The fact that the British were now engaged in a continuous attempt to describe, define, interpret, and categorize the social complexity of Indian society enhanced caste consciousness among all castes. This was the first time that the details of the castes and subcastes of the population were being reduced to writing and fixed by a central authority. Many caste groups also saw, in this Manu-like attempt at defining caste hierarchy, an opportunity to elevate their own caste in the total system. To achieve this goal, caste sabhās (organizations) were rapidly formed, and sometimes they mounted legal challenges in secular courts against their particular placements in the caste structure. The (newly) educated among the middle and low castes also researched mythology and caste histories and wrote about their own group or, again, commissioned a Brāhmaṇa to write Jātipurāṇas to support their claims. The Jātipurāṇas were by far the best means of mounting a challenge in the colonial period. They were written mostly by Brāhmaṇas in the language of the śāstras, which lent authenticity to a claim because both the British and the indigenous population held the Brāhmaṇas in high scholarly esteem. In the early period of the British rule, the Brāhmaṇas were often the only cultural link between the British and the local population.

The challenges to caste status in the form of petitions to authority, supported by Jātipurāṇas, were concerted attempts, though from diverse and often opposing quarters, to recast the balance of the regional caste hierarchy. Many Jātipurāṇas appeared around 1900 in anticipation of the second census to be held a year later.

VEENA DAS ON THE JĀTIPURĀṆAS

In an insightful paper, Veena Das (1967–68) advises a sociological approach to the study of the Jātipurāṇas. She studied two Jātipurāṇas from Gujarat: the Malla Purāṇa, written for the present wrestling caste of Jeṭhimallas who claim to be Brāhmaṇas; and the Kālikā Purāṇa, through which the coppersmiths seek a Kṣatriya status. She suggests that there is a vested interest in the writing of a Jātipurāṇa. It concerns castes that see a contradiction between their present low status and a claimed high status that they seek to validate. The method of validation is through myth but must be supported by further proof. For this, the present style of life must be reinterpreted, and if necessary modified, to accord with that which is commensurate with high status. To do this, some existing practices may be highlighted while others are ignored or suppressed. Das points to a mythography that employs archaism, the Sanskrit language, and some stylistic links with the Mahāpurāṇas. The Jātipurāṇas, she continues, are written because the caste hierarchy is dynamic, and they show that appeals can be made to the political power for change. Lastly, she takes issue with the anthropologist, Bronislaw Malinowski, who sees myth simply as a charter that validates the existence of the groups (a tribe, clan, lineage). It may also explain the existence of practices peculiar to such a group. Das argues that all myths are contentious in that they are not accepted especially by those who have a vested interest in status claims. She argues more generally that myths exist in the context of social contentions rather than have an independent existence.

Das argues for three salient points: (i) the Jātipurāṇas came about in the context of a contentious claim for high status; (ii) a myth can be used as argument in an oblique attempt to associate with the past; and (iii) a myth is a charter for some and a contention for others. Das' analysis is largely directed toward the general purpose and the overall mythography of a Jātipurāṇa. While these points serve as useful generalizations about the Jātipurāṇas and the myths contained in them, they serve as no guide for further analysis. In her desire to elucidate the function and structure of a Jātipurāṇa, Das ignores microhistory, that is, specific histories (events, actions, thoughts, and justificatory arguments) by particular castes and their Jātipurāṇas. An account of the Jātipurāṇa of the coppersmiths of Pandharpur in Maharashtra, who call themselves Ārya Kṣatriyas (noble warriors), will illustrate this point.²

THE JĀTIPURĀṆAS OF THE COPPERSMITHS OF PANDHARPUR

The Ārya Kṣatriyas, the coppersmiths, in the holy city of Pandharpur possessed customary rights to visit the famous shrine of Viṭṭhala and, like all high castes, worshipped the god from the maṇḍapa (covered anterior space outside the inner sanctum), but they were otherwise regarded as Śūdras in the varṇa system. However, in 1857, a claim circulated anonymously that they were in fact low-caste Jīṅgars (horse saddlemakers), whereupon the shrine management committee promptly excluded them from entering the maṇḍapa. The status of Jīṅgars in Marathi society was so low that the committee could do little else, forcing the coppersmith leaders to act. They took their case to the Śaṅkarācārya of the Śrīṅgeri maṭha, claiming that they were Ārya Kṣatriyas, and they included the following statement in their defense:

A mighty and powerful demon called Jñānumaṇḍala was notorious and feared in all the three worlds (triloka). He hated the gods because he knew it was they who had brought misery and defeat to his forebears. He, therefore, practiced severe austerities (tapas) for a very long time and obtained a boon from Brahmā that made him invincible. He then set out to conquer the three worlds and threatened to kill the ṛṣis and the gods. The frightened ṛṣis initially went to Brahmā and then to Viṣṇu for help. However, as they were unable to help them, the ṛṣis together with the two gods went to Śiva. Upon hearing of the havoc produced by Jñānumaṇḍala, Śiva was enraged. A drop of his perspiration gave rise to a son called Muktadeva, the liberated god. Upon Śiva's orders, Muktadeva fought a ferocious battle with Jñānumaṇḍala, destroyed his entire army, and killed him as well.

Pleased with his outstanding valor, Śiva bestowed upon Muktadeva a large kingdom on earth. Muktadeva married Prabhāvatī, daughter of the sage Durvāsa. The couple had eight sons: Jyoti, Bahunāma, Citravaṇṇa, Vicakṣaṇa, Rukmavaṇṇa, Rukmamāla, Rukmāṅgada, and Rukmabhūṣaṇa. Muktadeva married his eight sons to the daughters of the eight ṛṣis, gave them his kingdom, and retired to the forest with his wife to perform austerities.

Once, on a hunt into the forest, the eight princes came across a half-naked meditating sage named Lomahaṛṣa. The young princes made fun of him and threw sand and dirt at him. Enraged, the great sage cursed them and said they would lose their kingdom and their right to Vedic rituals forthwith. The frightened and repentant princes apologized and asked for redress. Sage Nārada conveyed this episode to Muktadeva, who then worshipped Śiva on behalf of his sons. Pleased with his austerity and remorse, Śiva appeared before Muktadeva and told him that while he would not undo Lomahaṛṣa's curse, his sons would be able to observe all non-Vedic rituals, and, with his blessing, they would be known henceforth as Ārya Kṣatriyas. Their progeny would become gifted artisans, such as painters, goldsmiths, sculptors, potters, metal craftsmen, and so on. Śiva also assigned them eight gotra (descent) identities: Bhāradvāja, Vāsiṣṭha, Gautama, Aṅgīrasa, Kaṇva, Gārgya, Jābāli, and Kaundinya.³

The myth thus adequately explains why, in spite of their Kṣatriya caste, the Ārya Kṣatriyas practice non-Kṣatriya professions, and it also explains their claim of royal descent. The Śaṅkarācārya of Śringeri accepted this version of the birth of the Ārya Kṣatriya caste, issued them a charter to this effect, and asked the trustees of the Viṭṭhala temple to allow them free access as before. (It appears that the trustees accepted this ruling.)

This story serves not so much to refute Veena Das as to refine what would be missed if one relied solely on her general outline of the Jātipurāṇas to explain their significance:

(i) The problem in this case was not a bid by the coppersmiths for the raising of their status, but an anonymous rumor that sought to downgrade them from their existing status. The rumor in this case was an effective means to attempt to lower another caste's position. More generally, rumors generated and circulated by contending individuals or castes are meant to arrest a caste's claim to higher status.

(ii) The ostensible contenders were the management committee of the temple who themselves were forced into a hostile decision, even if only to safeguard the sanctity of the temple. It was the contenders who raised the issue. Only then the smiths claimed a previously high status.

(iii) The authentication of the new status did not depend on differentiation of the present style of life and that appropriate to the claimed status. The smiths continued their occupations without distinguishing what was essential or appropriate for the new status. The validation process did not depend on association, narrative style, archaism, and so on, but simply on a story that was a plausible myth. Validation was achieved by claiming birth from Śiva and possession of a gotra identity. The birth of the ancestor was for a culturally desirable reason, namely, the destruction of an evildoer. A tripartite structure of high status, transgression and fall, and rehabilitation was involved. In this case, status rehabilitation was accompanied by a boon.

(iv) The decision-making authority was not political but religious in character. Authority was derived both from personal prestige and office, his learning, and the acceptance of an unusual role by a saṃnyāsin. This role for the Śāṅkarācārya came about in the context of the British but was not dependent on them. In fact it formed an alternative authority. The original dispute occurred not in the context of the new colonial power taking over or the census but, if at all, in the context of the Peśvās who were keen on preserving the primacy of the Brāhmaṇas. The Brāhmaṇa Peśvās who were culturally, politically, and socially dominant held to the theory that in Maharashtra there were only two varṇas in the Kali Yuga, namely, the Brāhmaṇas and the Śūdras. They enforced this division ruthlessly with the state power at their hand. They were especially wary of any claim to Kṣatriyahood by any caste which may presumably challenge their right to rule at anytime in future. (In passing, it may be noted that they had successfully excluded the Marāṭhā dynasty from Kṣatriyahood so much so that even now, Rājput royal lineages do not accept the Marāṭhās amongst their fold.)

(v) While it is not clear-cut, it may be argued that the publication in 1900 of the events that occurred in 1857 may have been related to the coming census of 1901. If so, the appeal to all smiths to use the Jātipurāṇas can be read as a revolt against Brāhmaṇa primacy.

(vi) Pandharpur is an all-India temple site, and the majority of devotees are low caste. The Brāhmaṇa committee would, therefore, have less concern with who worshipped the deity from the maṇḍapa.

(vii) The printed text was in Marathi prose, that is, for the consumption of a socially changing non-Brāhmaṇa/artisan population.

To summarize: cultural analysis in terms of narrative, content, and linguistic structures is helpful and does yield greater understanding, but it must be considered in conjunction with a general sociological inquiry.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE JĀTIPURĀṆAS

All Jātipurāṇas invariably contain common structural elements in their narrative style. A Jātipurāṇa describes the fall by a caste's distant forebears or indicates the performance of any other behavior which deviated substantially from the norm to which the caste aspires. The incurring of the wrath of the gods or the ṛṣis results in a curse which downgrades the offending caste to a lower, mostly Śūdra, varṇa. Finally, a Jātipurāṇa describes the expiation of the sin and/or rehabilitation of the caste at a level lower than the original but higher than its erstwhile status.

The employment of these structuring devices in Jātipurāṇas enabled many a caste to lay claim to an originally high, but now lost, status. Although immediate success was not always achieved, these devices often enabled the caste to keep its claim viable so that it might be reactivated at a later date. Since colonial times, this manner of a claim might in itself be a mark of both modernity and education and thus denotes a social status higher than that of other castes who have as yet not made such a claim. While many of the stories or rather the myths incorporated in these claims are fanciful and without significance, it appears that some castes have had a prima facie justification for claiming a high status in the distant past. While the census or the courts provide the opportunity for it, establishing such a claim is not easy. The caste first needs to prove, through arguments and evidence, their right to the claimed status. They must also demonstrate that their practices concerning marriage, dowry, widow remarriage, bigamy, purity and pollution, commensality, occupation are commensurate with the status they claim. Finally, the caste needs enough wealth and political power at the local/regional level to convince others to accept their claim. Even after adjudication in court, it often takes a caste a long time to succeed in acquiring the new status.

THE GURAVA JĀTIPURĀṆAS

I will now explore five Jātipurāṇas composed by or on behalf of the Śaiva Brāhmaṇa or Śaiva Gurava caste. I will first examine the background of these Jātipurāṇas so as to be able to put forward a hypothesis about the social forces that propelled the Guravas to commission these works. Second, I will analyze them in terms of their structure and cultural contents in order to discern the logic⁴ employed by the authors in an attempt to achieve their goal. Why, among the Guravas, is it only the Śaiva Guravas who have laid a claim to Brāhmaṇa-hood? Four of these Gurava Jātipurāṇas reveal a narrative structure which is centered on a retelling of, or reference to, the Sudarśana myth as found in the forty-fourth adhyāya of the Jñāna Saṃhitā of the Śiva Purāṇa.

The first Jātipurāṇa, the Devalaka Kathāmṛta, was published in 1905; the second, the Sthūla Śaivāgama, in 1909; the third, the Laghu Śaivāgama, in 1907; the fourth, Gaurava, in 1981; and the fifth, Guruvarya Gurava Kathāmṛta or Śivamahimecī Nandāvratakathā, in 1992. The year of the publication of the first three Jātipurāṇas is significant. Long before 1905, when the first Jātipurāṇa appeared, the Śaiva Guravas' claim to Brāhmaṇic status was already confirmed by a religious authority, the Śaṅkarācārya, in 1811 and in the courts in 1911 and later in 1938. Thus the Śaiva Guravas needed not to prove but required official evidence of their Brāhmaṇic practices. By 1900, and perhaps before, there were enough Guravas in occupations other than the one prescribed for their caste by tradition to make their caste claim, vis-à-vis other Brāhmaṇas, incidental. With the Jātipurāṇas in print, at least some of the Guravas were (and still are) making a claim to a status compatible with other elite castes.

THE DEVALAKA KATHĀMṚTA

The Devalaka Kathāmṛta is written in Marathi verse. The text, printed in palmleaf manuscript format, measures thirteen by nine centimeters and contains five chapters in forty-three pages. It was published at the Jagadhitecchu Press in Pune. The title page indicates that 'It was written by Balshastri Upasani, a Brāhmaṇa well versed in the Vedas and śāstras, according to the wishes of the late Martand Ramji Gurava Punekar and published by his son Nagesh Martand Gurava.' The next page offers an invitation to all Guravas to advertise and sell the book to their Gurava brethren. It also expresses the publishers' desire to print information about Gurava daily rituals (nityavidhi) and encourages the submission of all such information. This invitation is dated July 25, 1905. Its purpose was to obtain more proof of the Guravas' Brāhmaṇic identity because any evidence of the performance of daily rituals identical to those practiced by the Brāhmaṇas would add weight to their claim to Brāhmaṇahood. There is no evidence of published work prescribing daily rituals (āhnikavidhi) specifically for the Guravas. There was little danger that the details supplied by readers would not be Brāhmaṇic in conception. Brāhmaṇa practices themselves vary depending on the Gṛhyasūtra followed, and therefore any specific practice of the Guravas could be explained as simply another variation.

The narrative structure of the Devalaka Kathāmṛta resembles that of a Purāṇa. In the traditional evocative style, Balshastrī Upasani devotes the first few pages of the first chapter to an invocation to Gaṇeśa, the auspicious god. He also invokes Sarasvatī, the goddess of knowledge, Vyāsa, and Vālmiki, the non-Brāhmaṇa author of the Rāmāyaṇa. He then asserts that these three appeared before him and blessed his work. Through association and imitation of the Purāṇas, he offers the first proof of the authenticity of the contents of the Jātipurāṇa. On page six, Upasani recalls the idyllic Purāṇic scene, depicting Vyāsa and other sages engaged in discourse in the Naimiṣa Forest. The sages plead with Vyāsa to expound the greatness of a deity or to solve a difficult theological problem. Thus, the gathered devotees call Upasani their own sūta, or the narrator, and beg him to recount tales of the greatness of Śiva. They then pose a problem for him:

When we visit a Śiva temple, we always see a perverse (viparīta) practice there. The first pūjā is always performed by a Gurava, and Śiva and Gaurī accept this pūjā. Can you, therefore, explain the reasons behind this mystery and also the genesis of the Guravas? (6).

Upasani replies that the great sage Vyāsa himself explained the origin of the Guravas in the Śiva Purāṇa. He adds that the person described by Vyāsa as a Devalaka in Sanskrit is none other than the present-day Gurava. Adhyāya one ends thus:

Those who are called Devalakas in the Gīrvaṇa [Sanskrit] language are truly the Guravas. Let everyone hear their story in this adhyāya. I offer it to Sāmbasadāśiva [Śiva with Ambā (Pārvatī)]. Here ends the first adhyāya in the Devalaka Kathāmṛta (8).

Upasani begins the second adhyāya by reiterating that he had told the audience about the original name of the Guravas (that is, the Devalakas) in the first adhyāya. The tableau hinted at in the first adhyāya is recreated here with a formulaic description of ‘the Naimiṣa Forest,’ an idyllic place ‘replete with fruit-laden trees and countless shrubs with fragrant flowers.’ We are told that even the famous Malaya Mountain is jealous of this forest. Upasani calls the forest home to Tapodhanas,⁵ those ṛṣis wealthy in tapas, who practice every day. Thick smoke rising from the sacrificial fires of the ṛṣis has blackened the leaves of some of the trees. The ṛṣis sit together with their disciples in the afternoon, some discussing śāstras and Nyāya, others giving lessons in grammar and music. The sūta enters the scene, and the ṛṣis and the Brāhmaṇas, 'overwhelmed with joy,' ask him to narrate the story of the Devalakas. He replies that 'the Devalaka story is sacred, and the audience should listen to it carefully.' He then narrates the story:

Dadhici was a great Brāhmaṇa who was wealthy with great ascetic heat. He knew all the four Vedas, the six śāstras, and the eighteen Purāṇas. Dadhici was a great devotee of Śiva and worshipped the god day and night. He also performed daily Brāhmaṇic rituals and sacrifices. Dadhici had a son called Sudarśana whose wife was called Duṣkulā⁶ because she was born in a sinful family.

Once Dadhici was invited to a Brāhmaṇa council meeting in another town. He assigned the task of Śiva's pūjā to his son Sudarśana and went away (19–20).

The second adhyāya ends with the same formula as the first. Adhyāya three continues with our story:

While Dadhici was away, Sudarśana continued performing Śiva's pūjā at home. Then came Śivarātri. Everyone therefore fasted during the day, and so did Sudarśana. However, because he was in Duṣkulā's company, his mind was polluted because of her evil influence and he was not scared of committing a sin.⁷ He performed the pūjā of Śiva on this auspicious day and went home. However, instead of continuing his fast as required by the Śivarātri vrata, he dined with his wife at night and then had intercourse with her. Next morning, he got up in a hurry and went to the temple without taking a bath. The sinner entered the temple sanctum and worshipped Śiva in that impure state. Śiva was infuriated and appeared before Sudarśana in his terrible form with five heads and ten hands, all holding shining weapons. The fire of the destruction of the world poured out of his eyes. He kicked Sudarśana and told him that there was no sinner greater than him. The god said that Sudarśana had committed three unpardonable sins: consuming food on a sacred day instead of fasting, engaging in intercourse on such a day, and performing the god's pūjā without first taking the purificatory bath. For these sins, Śiva cursed Sudarśana to become lifeless. Having uttered this terrible curse, Śiva disappeared. At that very instant, Sudarśana fainted and Duṣkulā died from grief.

Sudarśana returned to earth⁸ and was grief-stricken by his wife's death. He cursed himself that he was the one who was responsible for all the terrible happenings and that he was paying for his sins in his previous birth. He said,

‘As it was, he was fallen, and now he was a widower. No one in the world would care for him now.’ He then took her body to the cremation ground and got his sons to do the last rites for her (26–27).

The third adhyāya ends the same way as the first two with the formulaic statement used in the two proceeding chapters. In the fourth adhyāya, the story continues:

Having heard the terrible news, Dadhici returned home in a hurry and blamed Sudarśana for inviting the wrath of Śiva. He then invoked both Śiva and his consort Bhavānī. He pleaded with them and said that Sudarśana was like a son to them and that they should therefore forgive him. He then asked Sudarśana to worship Bhavānī. Pleased with Sudarśana’s austerities and sincerity, Pārvaṭī appeared before them and pleaded with Śiva repeatedly on their behalf. Pleased with this, Śiva appeared before Sudarśana and made him sit next to him. Śiva bathed him with ghī and gave him the sacred thread with three strands. He asked Sudarśana to recite the sacred Śivagāyatrī-mantra, oṃ namaḥ śivāya,⁹ and worship Gaurī. Śiva then dictated the mode of the ṣoḍaśapacāra-pūjā for himself.¹⁰ He said to Sudarśana: ‘You will be the highest among my devotees and will precede all others at every pūjā. Items, such as grains, flowers, clothing, and ghī, that my devotees bring for my pūjā will be yours, so also any precious stones or other wealth. You will make a living out of these. My pūjā will not be complete unless you say words to that effect. At any feeding of the Brāhmaṇas, at least one Gurava¹¹ must be included, otherwise the feast will not accrue any merit. Take this as the truth, my baṭu.’¹²

Śiva also decreed, ‘Sudarśana must not recite mantras from the Vedas, and he should respect Brāhmaṇas and eat only vegetarian food’ (27).

Śiva then explained the dharma (of the Devalakas) to Sudarśana. This consisted of a daily ritual bath in a sacred river, rigorous performance of the rituals, putting a round sandalwood mark (tilaka) on the forehead,¹³ and performance of the Śivasandhyā.

The ban on reciting the Vedic mantras was extended to Sudarśana’s progeny as well. Śiva said that although the progeny of Sudarśana had lost their Vedic rites, they should worship him constantly, and that he was giving them the special name of Devalaka. The god said that no one ought to perform his pūjā before a Devalaka does it. He decreed that a Devalaka must be respected, whether he be pure or sinful. Those who fed Brāhmaṇas in order to please Śiva or Pārvaṭī ought to include at least one Devalaka among the invitees. If the Devalaka was satiated by the meal, then Śiva himself would be equally happy. Here ends the fourth adhyāya.

The fifth and final adhyāya is essentially a māhātmya of the Devalakas wherein the story of the great king Bhadrāsena is told and affirms the new status of the Devalakas:

Bhadrāsena conquered the whole world. He remained, however, extremely kind to all his people, and he was also a great devotee of Śiva. Pleased with his singular devotion, Śiva appeared before him and offered him whatever he wanted, including Indra's throne. Bhadrāsena refused to ask for any material reward. However, he asked Śiva to grant him some means to show whether he had fulfilled his daily rituals and duties toward Śiva. Śiva gave Bhadrāsena a special pennant and asked him to raise it every morning. If Bhadrāsena performed his daily duties properly, then the pennant would fall to the ground. However, in spite of all his good deeds, including feeding thousands of Brāhmaṇas daily, the pennant remained upright. The saddened king did not know what to do. One day a Devalaka visited the king and was fed along with the Brāhmaṇas. The pennant fell to the ground instantly. The Brāhmaṇas then explained to the king that the pennant fell due to the very special meritorious deed of feeding a Devalaka. They also explained that feeding even a crore [ten million] of Brāhmaṇas was not much good unless a Devalaka was fed as well. The right to his first pūjā of the day was given by Śiva himself to the Devalakas. After that, Bhadrāsena made sure a Devalaka was properly fed and clothed every day (40).

At the end of the chapter and the Purāṇa, Upasani says that this account of the Devalakas was narrated by the sūta to Śaunaka and other ṛṣis and that he, Upasani, now tells it to the gathered devotees. He says: 'Just as Śiva and Śaṅkara are two names for the same god, Ghaṭa and Ghāgara (a Marathi word) are the two names for the same pot, Śarkarā and Sākhara (a Marathi word) are the two names for the same sugar, similarly Devalaka and Gurava are the two names for the same person.' Upasani finally declares that those Guravas who read this Purāṇa every day¹⁴ will be looked after by Śiva and will acquire a good family, wealth, and happiness.

Main features of the Devalaka Kathāmṛta

The main features that identify the Devalaka Kathāmṛta with a Purāṇa also serves as its raison d'être, namely, the desire to prove the Brāhmaṇic status of the Guravas. The text is divided into adhyāyas, the first establishes the identity of the narrator, Upasani, and his audience. Adhyāyas two to four tell the main story of the transformation of the Brāhmaṇa Sudarśana into a Devalaka. Finally, adhyāya five narrates a story of King Bhadrāsena who ignores the primacy of the Devalakas in Śiva's pūjā. He is punished by Śiva who withholds approval until he rights the wrong. The final māhātmya is typical of the Purāṇas and contains instruction about worship rituals. It constitutes an illustration that reinforces the main story. The division of the narrative into adhyāyas is a Purāṇic practice. The close of each chapter utilizes a Purāṇic device to link the Devalakas of the past with the present-day Guravas.

The text was composed in the Marathi, not in the Sanskrit, language. This might have been due to a reluctance on the part of the Brāhmaṇa narrator to use Sanskrit in a text that, however slightly, accords primacy to the Guravas over the Brāhmaṇas. The choice of Marathi might also indicate that the writer was simply documenting a Marathi practice and the myth that accompanied it. Whatever the rationale of the author, use of Marathi certainly made the text more accessible to the Guravas, most of whom did not (and do not) know Sanskrit. It is possible that the Gurava patron who published the text requested that it be written in Marathi.

Divergence between Devalaka Kathāmṛta and adhyāya 44 of the Jñāna Saṃhitā of the Śiva Purāṇa Conversations with Gurava elders revealed that they believed that their origin is described in the forty-fourth adhyāya of the Jñāna Saṃhitā of the Śiva Purāṇa and that they hold that they are the descendants of Sudarśana, the Devalaka of the Śiva Purāṇa myth. They relayed that many Guravas use Devalaka as a surname. The myth, as it unfolds in Jñāna Saṃhitā 44, is essentially the same as that reproduced in the Devalaka Kathāmṛta, although there are noteworthy differences.

The *sūta*¹⁵ category of narrators of Purāṇic myth are no longer extant in Maharashtra. Their function is taken over by Brāhmaṇas. Upasani, the narrator of the Devalaka Kathāmṛta, is a Brāhmaṇa. The Jñāna Saṃhitā starts with a warning to the Brāhmaṇas about becoming Devalakas. Contrarily, in the Devalaka Kathāmṛta, the audience is aware of the perverse practice (viparīta) of a Gurava preceding a Brāhmaṇa in the pūjā. Because Jñāna Saṃhitā 44 is embedded in a larger text, it does not evoke a recreation of the Naimiṣa location as Devalaka Kathāmṛta does. In addition, and unlike the Jñāna Saṃhitā, the Devalaka Kathāmṛta account tells us that Dadhici has gone away to another town to solve a community dispute. To a Marathi audience, this information would convey that Dadhici was indeed a 'wise man.'

The Devalaka Kathāmṛta is notably more critical of Sudarśana's wife Duṣkulā and of women in general. In this text, it seems that all women are polluted and 'simply associating with them leads to frightful consequences.' Association with women is like 'drinking poison or inviting Yama'; it signals one's demise. Upasani's contempt for women and his tirade against them is not atypical in Indian literature. In Maharashtra and elsewhere, women were seen as inhibiting bhakti or other modes of salvation. In the Devalaka Kathāmṛta, we are told that Sudarśana's wife is Duṣkulā (one from an evil lineage) as opposed to Duṣkalpā (one who is incompetent) as in Jñāna Saṃhitā. Further, 'Duṣkulā' implies a genealogical handicap that is irreversible, while 'Duṣkalpā' suggests a personal, regrettable and hence a lesser family.

In general, the Devalaka Kathāmṛta is less restrained in depicting the emotions of its characters. The text describes Śiva's anger in frightening detail. It also describes Sudarśana's grief as he cremates Duṣkulā after her death, and his sons perform the last rites for her. The Devalaka Kathāmṛta is a kāvya interested in pathos (karuṇa rasa) much more so than a typical Purāṇa, and the inclusion of elaborate emotional appeals suggests that it was as much for public recitation as for private reading.

Most importantly, in the Devalaka Kathāmṛta, it is Śiva who adopts Sudarśana as the baṭu, not Girijā as in Jñāna Saṃhitā 44. One can only speculate as to why Upasani would make this change, as he would no doubt have read the Jñāna Saṃhitā. Perhaps Upasani would have liked a charter that positively affirmed their Brāhmaṇa status. To repeat, Upasani is unwilling to grant it to them explicitly.

There are several indications that Upasani wrote for the Gurava patrons. Unlike in the Jñāna Saṃhitā, Upasani makes a direct identification between the Devalakas and the Guravas. Śiva gives the name Devalaka to Sudarśana's lineage, and at the end of each adhyāya, Upasani makes it clear to his audience that those who are called Devalakas are 'without doubt the Guravas.' However, Upasani is a Brāhmaṇa and, as such, cannot and will not raise the Guravas into Brāhmaṇas; as in Jñāna Saṃhitā, he also puts a ban on the Guravas reciting the Veda.

The Devalaka Kathāmṛta provides a full phalaśruti, the reward for listening to and reciting the text. Upasani enjoins everyone, especially the Guravas, to listen and obtain rewards. He then outlines the modes of worship to be performed by the Guravas every Monday, a worship he promises will remove all obstacles. Yet the Jñāna Saṃhitā's phalaśruti, contrary to normal practice, is in the māhātmya and is addressed to all and sundry. It only enjoins them to feed the Devalaka beforehand at a ritual meal. The import of this is clear. While the Devalaka Kathāmṛta is essentially directed toward the Guravas, the Jñāna Saṃhitā is aimed at a wider audience. The readers of the Jñāna Saṃhitā are meant to see the story of the Devalakas as one amongst numerous stories that constitute the Jñāna Saṃhitā and, indeed, the Śiva Purāṇa. Hence the reward promised in the phalaśruti by the Jñāna Saṃhitā is only a minor and casual part of the reward promised by the reading of the whole of the Śiva Purāṇa.

Narrative structure of the Devalaka Kathāmṛta

Finally, like the Jñāna Saṃhitā, the Devalaka Kathāmṛta is also structured as a rite of passage (van Gennepe 1960: 18, 105–6, 191). In the second adhyāya, we are informed of the initial status of Sudarśana. There he is the son of the Brāhmaṇa Dadhici. In the third adhyāya, Sudarśana dies because of his transgression. In other words, he enters liminality (absence of status). In the fourth adhyāya, through the ritual of worship by his father and the intervention of Pārvatī and Śiva, he gains a new status. Here it is Śiva who takes him in his lap. In the fifth adhyāya, the new status is confirmed by the king's act and broadcast to the people at large.¹⁶ Unlike Jñāna Saṃhitā 44, a notable feature of the Devalaka Kathāmṛta is that it does not describe Sudarśana's sin as threefold. The Jñāna Saṃhitā is obviously 'structural' par excellence in that it is aware of tripartism embodied in Hindu modes of thought. The Devalaka Kathāmṛta, a text meant presumably for a less learned by highly devoted and involved leadership, likely did not need themes which are erudite but only confusing to the audience. Alternatively, one can argue that the theme of 'triple burden of sins,' if brought into the Devalaka Kathāmṛta, would have made the reversal/salvation of Sudarśana (and his progeny, the Guravas) more problematic, difficult to credit, and so on.

THE LAGHU ŚAIVĀGAMA

The Laghu Śaivāgama is divided into three chapters, comprising approximately sixty pages.¹⁷ The printed text measures thirteen by twenty-two centimeters. The colophon after the last chapter gives us some information about the author and the Purāṇa itself:

The Purāṇa was composed by Sitaram Dajiba Pande¹⁸ who calls himself a Śaivadvija¹⁹ and who was the pujārī of the Jāgṛteśvara Devasthāna in Nagpur. It was published by Motivilas Press in Nagpur in 1907.

The Laghu Śaivāgama essentially forwards an argument to prove that the Guravas are Brāhmaṇas. It also uses the Sudarśana myth to claim Brāhmaṇa-hood.

Chapter one is eighteen pages and begins by paying homage to Śiva. It then develops long-winded explanations as to why the Guravas should be recognized as Brāhmaṇas. It argues that even in the highest and most coveted Brāhmaṇa varṇa, there are distinctions such as Pañcagaṇḍa and Pañcadraviḍa. Among these main divisions, there are many kulas (lineages) that are considered higher or lower depending on the duties allotted to them by tradition (paramparā). Among the various Brāhmaṇa castes are the Devalaka Brāhmaṇas known in Marathi as the Guravas. Pande stresses that these Devalaka Brāhmaṇas are known in Sanskrit as devalaka vipras. As the author has an adequate knowledge of Sanskrit, his use of the term ‘vipra’ (learned) seems deliberate. The use of that particular term implies that the Devalakas were, indeed, learned Brāhmaṇas. He adds that other Brāhmaṇas, not just the Devalakas, are forbidden from adopting temple worship as a profession.

To support his claim, Pande quotes Jñāna Saṁhitā:

The man who acts beneficially for the continuity of the world should worship the god Śiva. But he should not propitiate Śiva with a desire for the wealth of others. The Brāhmaṇa who does this for six months is certainly called a Devalaka. Since he is called a Devalaka, he now definitely becomes one (1).

Pande acknowledges that the Guravas who call themselves Devalaka Brāhmaṇas are looked down upon by other Brāhmaṇas because they live upon the offerings made to Śiva by other devotees. He sees a derogatory slant in these ślokas and considers the refutation of it as a major task.

Pande’s bold case begins by arguing that the Devalaka Brāhmaṇas have acquired many boons due to the austerities they have performed, and they are therefore the greatest among Brāhmaṇas! Unless one is born into their kula, he says, it is impossible to equal them. This statement elevates the Devalakas above other Brāhmaṇas. As he tells it, the only shortcoming the Devalakas have is that they do not have the right to recite the Brahmagāyatrī-mantra. This privilege was taken away by Śiva because of a transgression their forebear committed. However, Śiva later pardoned him and taught him the Śivagāyatrī-mantra, which Pande calls the ‘very Vedic mother’ of the Brahmagāyatrī-mantra. Pande stresses that only the Devalakas are allowed to accept money (dakṣiṇā) for performing Śiva’s pūjā, whereas other Brāhmaṇas may perform Śiva’s pūjā without accepting a dakṣiṇā. As the term ‘dakṣiṇā’ refers to the gift given to a Brāhmaṇa for specific services and not a stipend, Pande argues that the use of the term implies Brāhmaṇa status for the Devalakas.

In the Laghu Śaivāgama, Pande scathingly attacks the Marathi Brāhmaṇas whom he calls ‘the greatest enemies of the Guravas.’ He claims that the selfish Marathi Brāhmaṇas have stolen the right of the Devalaka Brāhmaṇas to perform Śiva-pūjā in the Kali Yuga. Due to this selfish action, Pande says, they have themselves lost their right to Vedic rituals. He reiterates that the acceptance of dakṣiṇā in the Śiva temple is the sole right of the Devalaka Brāhmaṇa and drives home the point that there is a big difference between a Devalaka who can do this and the mean and selfish Brāhmaṇa who performs the pūjā for monetary gains only because he does not possess this divine right.

To support his arguments, Pande again quotes the Jñāna Saṃhitā:

[In the temple, Śiva’s] pūjā performed as laid down in the past must be performed only by a baṭuka. If, however, it is performed by oneself at one’s own home, there is no rule [as to who should perform it] (7).

Pande argues that while the question of the lower status of the Devalakas is raised only because of his inability to recite Vedic mantras, his membership in the Brāhmaṇa varṇa is an established fact. Finally, Pande declares what seems to him the ultimate proof of the Devalaka’s Brāhmaṇahood. He argues that Dadhici is the son of Brahmā, and so he must be a Brāhmaṇa. As the Devalakas are born in Dadhici’s kula, he states, not even Vyāsa could say that the Devalakas are not Brāhmaṇas.

The great differences in status among Maharashtrian Brāhmaṇas show that in spite of being ‘proven’ as Brāhmaṇas, they are still not rated equally. Pande quotes from the Karmavipākā in which it is said that Brāhmaṇas who study the Vedas after consuming betel leaf are later born into the kula of Devarāṣṭrīya Brāhmaṇas.²⁰ Pande also mentions another work, the Tristhalīsetu, which states that Brāhmaṇas who subsisted only by farming and agriculture became Citapāvana Brāhmaṇas,²¹ one of the five kinds of Brāhmaṇas—Devalaka, Citapāvana, Gayāval, Devarukhe, and Karhāde—that are barred from Vedic duties.²² Some are barred from performing yajñas, others from yajñas and śrāddhas; some should not be sighted first thing in the morning, while others should not attend feasts reserved for higher Brāhmaṇas. Finally, some may not recite the Brahmagāyatrī-mantra. Pande ends his arguments by saying that my discussion and logic are as clear and visible as the brilliant sun. However, for those who are like the stars falling in the night, the sun is obviously invisible. Further, for those who have been blinded by the darkness of hate and thoughtlessness, the greatness and the Brāhmaṇahood of the Devalakas are not apparent (18).

Chapter one ends with the following colophon:

Here ends the first chapter of the first part of the Laghu Śaivāgama, entitled 'The judgement on the varṇa rights of the Devalaka Brāhmaṇas.' It includes a commentary in Marathi, produced by the Śivadviya Sitaram, the temple priest of Jāgṛteśvara temple, by the blessing of Lord Jāgṛteśvara (18).

Chapter two retells the story of Sudarśana, and it has much in common with the events described in the Jñāna Saṃhitā and the Devalaka Kathāmṛta. However, Pande takes two or three ślokas at a time from Jñāna Saṃhitā 44 and provides a commentary in a way that benefits his Marathi cause. In a lengthy discussion, Pande emphasizes the importance of the Devalakas, and thus of the Guravas, in Śiva's pūjā, and he chastises the Brāhmaṇas for their greed and jealousy. Pande quotes and comments on all fifty-four ślokas of the Jñāna Saṃhitā. The majority of Pande's Gurava readers would know little Sanskrit and would regard his frequent quoting of Sanskrit ślokas as a sign of erudition.

After official commentary, Pande speculates on the possible etymology of the word 'gurava.' He suggests that the story of Sudarśana proves that the Devalakas are the gurus or *upādhyes*²³ for the pilgrims and devotees at Śiva temples. He claims that the highest among the Brāhmaṇas, well versed in the Vedas, must worship the Devalakas at the Śiva temple first.²⁴ Pande argues that the Devalakas are the gurus. His logic is that as the plural of guru is guravaḥ, the Śiva temple priests are known collectively as guravaḥ. As the plurals Brāhmaṇāḥ and Vaiśyaḥ become Brāhmaṇa and Vaiśya in Marathi (because they lose the -aḥ at the end), it naturally follows that the plural guravaḥ would become gurava. As proof of his ingenious arguments, Pande cites his encounter with a Kannada Brāhmaṇa, and he describes the prolonged discussions they had regarding the status of the Guravas. With the help of books such as the Jātimālā, this Brāhmaṇa convinced Pande that the Guravas were Brāhmaṇas at Śiva temples.²⁵

Pande's third chapter begins by quoting two ślokas from the *Mahāśaivāgama*²⁶ in which Śiva informs Pārvatī that Śuddhaśaivas are those who have been born of Śiva himself. The Śivadviyas should be revered and not be denied the adequate dakṣiṇā that is owed to them. Pande once again distinguishes the Guravas from the other Brāhmaṇas who, in his view, often encroach upon the Guravas' right to perform Śiva's pūjā and to accept material gain for it.

Pande defines three types of Śaivas: the Śuddhaśaivas or the Guravas, the Viraśaivas, and the Sāmānyaśaivas. Sāmānyaśaivas are not Śaiva Brāhmaṇas. They may belong to any, except the Brāhmaṇa, varṇa, but their main dharma is the worship of Śiva. The author then narrates a brief statement on the origin of the Śuddhaśaivas:

Once Śiva was practicing austerities on the banks of the river Sindhu when a lustrous being emanated from his body. He was variously called Śaiva, Tapodhana, and Śivadvija. Like Sudarśana, Śiva called him his son and taught him the sacred Śivasandhyā- and Śivagāyatrī-mantras (35).²⁷

According to Pande, then, the Śaiva Brāhmaṇas or the Śuddhaśaivas have originated in two ways, from Sudarśana or alternatively from the lustrous being described above, but the Vīraśaivas share a common origin. Pande takes up his argument again and relates another myth regarding the origin of the Vīraśaivas. This myth tells us that there was once a terrible fight between the Śuddhaśaivas and Agni, who receives bali, the share of offerings at sacrifices on behalf of all the gods. Pande gives no reason for the fight (but the obvious reference is to Dakṣa's sacrifice, when, according to one version, Vīrabhadra was born). In the battle between the Śuddhaśaivas and Agni, the enraged Śuddhaśaivas kicked the earth, and a lustrous being was produced as a result. He was variously called Vīraśaiva, Bhaṣmāṅkura, and Jaṅgama. Śiva did not give him any varṇic rights. However, he was allowed to beg from all four varṇas. Pande points out that the difference between a Śuddhaśaiva and a Vīraśaiva is that although the former is allowed to keep for his own use all the offerings made to Śiva, the latter may only take as much as is required for mere sustenance. Pande is well aware of the fact that Marathi Brāhmaṇas equate the Guravas with the Vīraśaivas and their priests, the Jaṅgamas. To them all three are Śūdras. This must be seen as Pande's attempt to elevate the Guravas above the Vīraśaivas in the caste hierarchy. While he accepts the Guravas as fallen Devalaka Brāhmaṇas, he places the Jaṅgamas in a lower category.

Pande goes on to say that some Brāhmaṇas are of the opinion similar to that of the Śivadvijas (the Guravas) and believe that others born out of varṇasaṅkara also have the right to Śiva's pūjā and to accept śivasvam. These Brāhmaṇas quote the Śūdrakamalākara in support of their argument:

A fallen Śiva worshipper of the Pāśupata sect is known as a Jaṅgama. A son born to a Jaṅgama by a Śūdra wife is called a Bhaṣmāṅkura. Wearing matted hair and bhasma, he should worship the Śiva liṅga. The betel leaves, rice, money, cows, cowry shells, and so on, that are given to Śiva by others out of devotion are called Caṇḍīśa. Bhaṣmāṅkura's livelihood is by this Caṇḍīśa (37).

Pande then mentions that other Brāhmaṇas are of the opinion that the Jaṅgamas are born from Śivadvija's feet and are therefore different from the Bhasmāṅkuras. He is keen to show that the opinion of the latter Brāhmaṇas is correct, and he cites Kamalakarabhatta's grandfather, Narayanabhatta, who wrote the Jātimālā:

Those Devalaka Brāhmaṇas who fell from their duties of performing austerities are known as Guravas. They are also known as Śivadvijas. A son born to a Gurava of a Śūdra wife is a Bhasmāṅkura, and he is known popularly as a Jaṅgama. Wearing matted locks and bhasma, he should perform the pūjā of the Śiva liṅga. Items such as betel leaves, fruit, rice, and so on, offered to Śiva should be consumed by him. Thus say the Śaivāgamas (38).

The first quote above portrays the Bhasmāṅkuras lower than the Jaṅgamas; the second makes the Jaṅgamas lower than the Guravas. In both cases, it is a Śūdra mother who determines the status of the child; the union is anuloma. It is permissible but degrading to the progeny.

Pande extols the sage Narayanabhatta as a great paṇḍita who made even the Yavana king pay respect to him when he caused rain to fall on his command. The sage was also able to persuade the Yavana king to permit the Hindus to rebuild the Kāśīviśveśvara temple destroyed by Aurangzeb.²⁸ Finally, Pande tells us that even Kamalakarabhatta, in the introduction to the Śūdrakamālākara, pays homage to his famous grandfather thus: 'I bow to Bhattanarayana, my grandfather, Hari who assumed human form to protect the Vedas and the dharma.' Here Pande draws on Marathi tradition, implying that the work of such a great scholar and sage is beyond approach. Finally, he cites the Jātidarpaṇa, authored by Narayanabhatta's son and Kamalakarabhatta's father, Ramakrishnabhatta. It distinguishes between the Guravas and the Jaṅgamas to the detriment of the latter.

Pande concludes his exposition by suggesting that both the Guravas and the Jaṅgamas are Pāśupatas. He distinguishes the Guravas as vipra (Brāhmaṇa) Pāśupatas and the Jaṅgamas as Śaṅkara Pāśupatas who are produced as a result of hypogamy.

Pande's ambitious aim in the third chapter is to prove the Brāhmaṇahood of the Guravas, ends up arguing for the distinction of the Guravas above all the other Śaivites.

Unusual as it may seem, we might say that the Laghu Śaivāgama is a Jātipurāṇa written as a typical Sanskrit work in which ślokas are compiled from the Jñāna Saṃhitā and other texts, while the ṭīka (commentary) and the translation are in Marathi. Stylistically, it closely resembles the Śūdrakamālākara. One might even say that it is a counterpoint to the Śūdrakamālākara, the sole purpose of which seems to be to denigrate and exclude Śūdras from most ritual participation. Pande's work is not a defense of Śūdras but an affirmation of the Devalakas as Brāhmaṇas. Like Kamalakarabhata, Pande is an erudite scholar who knows how to borrow adroitly from the Sanskrit paramparā, and he also writes his Marathi translation as a stirring commentary for the Marathi public.

Pande's argumentative technique is simple. He uses attack as the best defense and defense as the best attack. He recognizes that the Brāhmaṇas are major opponents and knows well that status depends upon the acceptance or rejection of a group's offerings to Śiva. His argument centers around the contentious statement in Jñāna Saṃhitā 44 that the Devalakas were denied Brahmagāyatrī. Against this, he asserts that the Devalakas are the highest of the Brāhmaṇas, that is, they are solely entitled to the privilege of making offerings to Śiva. In short, he argues that the Śivagāyatrī is the original gāyatrī. He supports these claims not just by means of textual references, but he unleashes an invective against the Brāhmaṇas of a kind not normally heard from any Hindu but the Cārvākans. He says that the Brāhmaṇas are covetous and jealous because they are deprived. The Devalakas must take what is theirs as ordained by Śiva.

Another tactic he employs is to argue that all the Marathi Brāhmaṇas are sullied in one way or another and that only the Devalakas hold on to pure dharma by following Jñāna Saṃhitā 44. Thus, he turns what is meant to degrade the Devalakas to their advantage. Finally, he traces links from the Devalakas to Brahmā, the arch-Brāhmaṇa, through his son Dadhici. Pande's claim is uncompromising: among the Śaivite priests, the Guravas are the highest. By raising issues of etymology and by illustrating the connection with Karnataka, Pande also makes astute appeal to modernity.

THE STHŪLA ŚAIVĀGAMA

This third Gurava Jātipurāṇa is compiled in Sanskrit verse. The printed text of the Sthūla Śaivāgama is in palmleaf manuscript format, measures sixteen by ten centimeters, and contains fifty-six pages in six chapters. In addition, a thirteen-page addendum details the daily rituals of Śiva devotees. The text gives important information about the various Śaiva sects (śākhās) and gotras. Like the Laghu Śaivāgama, this Purāṇa mentions the term 'gurava' in one of its ślokas, and it declares that Śuddhaśaivas have long been known as Guravas and that they belong to the Brāhmaṇa varṇa. The last page of the Purāṇa states that it was compiled by (the Gurava) Kashinathswami Jehurkar, son of Bhagwantswami of Jehur Maṭha. Jehurkar writes that this publication was made possible by the financial help given by many people to (Gurava) Bhavanirao Bapurao Dange Solapurkar, who published it at the Dattaprasada Press.

The date of the publication is Monday, the twelfth day of full moon in the month of Māgha, Śālivāhana Śaka 1831 (1909 CE). Jehurkar stresses that the text 'is a small effort on our part to explain to the people the ācāras of the Devalaka Brāhmaṇas, also known as Śuddhaśaivas or Guravas.' He writes that 'due to the absence of people with a good knowledge of Sanskrit among us, I have been forced to take the material out of old Sanskrit manuscripts without checking it for grammatical correctness.' He then asks 'knowledgeable readers to convey to him grammatical mistakes that they may find in the work, so that they can be corrected in the second edition' (71). The attitude of humility implied by the request is not uncommon among writers in Sanskrit.

In fact, Jehurkar is well informed about the various Śaiva doctrines and Śaivāgamas. His book is a compilation of material taken from various texts expounding Śaivism. At the beginning of each chapter, the name of the original work from which the chapter has been drawn is listed.

The Sthūla Śaivāgama cannot be called a Jātipurāṇa in the strict sense, as it is a reproduction of chapters from various Śaivite texts. Although intertextuality is an important feature of most Purāṇas, it is the only feature of the Sthūla Śaivāgama. Jehurkar's original contribution is his own commentary on, and including translation of, the selected Sanskrit materials. The Sthūla Śaivāgama is a samhitā with commentary. Even so, it is a major contribution in its own right. Jehurkar, the compiler, provides elaborate explanations and a keen analysis in Marathi of all the Sanskrit ślokas included in the text. (These explanations shed some light on the reasons why Jehurkar, himself a Gurava, put this compilation together.) The Sthūla Śaivāgama is used by many Guravas as a Jātipurāṇa, and this justifies a careful study of it.

Summary of the contents of the Sthūla Śaivāgama

After traditional homage to Gaṇeśa and Sarasvatī, chapter one has Pārvatī asking Śiva to explain why the Śuddhaśaivas are considered the greatest among the Brāhmaṇas. She also asks how many kinds of Śaivas exist. Śiva replies that there are seven kinds of Śaivas: Anādiśaiva, one without beginning, that is, Śiva himself; Ādiśaivas, the first Śaivas, that is, the ṛṣis Kauśika, Kaśyapa, Bhāradvāja, Atri, and Gautama; Mahāśaivas, the great Śaivas, that is, Brāhmaṇas ordained in the Śaiva way; Anuśaivas, followers of the Śaiva-dharma, such as kings and Vaiśyas; Avāntaraśaivas, other Śaivas, that is, Śūdras ordained in the Śaiva way; Pravaraśaivas, devotees born of an anuloma union; and Antyaśaivas, born in other low castes, that is, the lowest Śaivas.

At the end of this chapter, Śiva also classifies Śaivas according to their particular practice of worship. These are: the Viraśaivas, Śaivas who have transcended the boundaries of the six vices, including lust and anger, and who have looked within themselves to the ātman (self); the Śuddhaśaivas, the pure Śaiva Brāhmaṇas who have been born from Śiva and who are held in high esteem by the people; the Miśraśaivas, those who worship all deities, including Śiva; and the Sāmānyaśaivas, the ordinary people who worship Śiva.

The author claims that the first chapter of the Sthūla Śaivāgama is a faithful reproduction of the second chapter of the Śaivaratnākara. However, chapter two of Śaivaratnākara differs considerably from the version produced in the Sthūla Śaivāgama. The diction of several ślokas is different, and many ślokas in the Sthūla Śaivāgama have no parallel in the Śaivaratnākara.

Some ślokas in the Sthūla Śaivāgama seem to be there for the sole purpose of differentiating between the Śuddhaśaivas (Guravas) and the Viraśaivas and denigrating the latter. Jehurkar provides rather free translations of all the ślokas, such as these quoted below.

In ślokas 25–28, Śiva says:

The Śaiva produced from me is called the Śuddhaśaiva. [Such people] are known as Śivadviyas, and they become venerable among people. The sacrifices for self and others should be performed only by them. They should then be given a dakṣiṇā, and no deceit should be practiced. The Śuddhaśaiva is thus. Now hear about the Viraśaiva. Having lost faults such as anger, and having examined the self within, and by the complete loss of doubt and weakness, a Viraśaiva is born. Pārvatī! I have now told you the three ways about becoming a Viraśaiva.

These ślokas differentiate the Śuddhaśaivas from the Viraśaivas (Lingāyats). This distinction is important for Jehurkar, in that he equates the Guravas as Brāhmaṇas and Śuddhaśaivas (that is, Brāhmaṇas) in contrast to the Viraśaivas who doctrinally reject the varṇa system altogether. Were the Guravas to be taken as Viraśaivas, they would be totally outside the varṇa system. This would decisively defeat their claim to Brāhmaṇahood.

The second chapter of the Śaivaratnākara is short and also deals with differences among the Śaivas. It lists the seven types of Śaivas but declares that those possessing the five gotras are born of the five mouths (pañcamukha) of Śiva. These are the Śuddhaśaivas, and, as possessors of gotras, they are also Brāhmaṇas. On pain of being reborn as Brahmarākṣasas, they must avoid śivadīkṣā and the touch of the līṅga. If, during their pūjā, a dīkṣita enters the sanctum, then they should purify it again with mantras.

The text mentions the Viraśaivas and extols them as possessors of esoteric knowledge and of knowing the way to mokṣa. This chapter divides Śaiva teachings into śrauta (heard) and aśrauta (literally ‘not heard but remembered’). The former is time-consuming, but its reward is that it dissolves the self prior to mokṣa. The latter is essentially to be pursued by others according to their jātidharma. Śrauta here refers to be ‘heard’ from Śiva himself and is therefore ‘authentic.’

Chapter two of the Sthūla Śaivagāma contains the Śaivite version of the Puruṣasūkta. In this story, Śiva replaces the Puruṣa, and the Vedas, the earth, and the Brāhmaṇas are created out of Śiva’s mouth, the Kṣatriyas from his arms, the Vaiśyas from his heart, and the Śūdras from his feet. The duties of each of these varṇas is then outlined. While the chapter posits the theological primacy of Śiva, there is no mention of the Guravas here. Jehurkar is knowledgeable about the mythical account of the origin of the varṇa system, and he purposefully reproduces a Śaivite text that has very high Brāhmaṇical status. His purpose is to assert that some Śaivites, especially the Guravas, accept the varṇa system. This is a tactical prerequisite in the fight to accord Brāhmaṇic status to the Guravas, and the implication of this is that since Jaṅgamas and Vīrśaivas reject the caste/varṇa system, they need not be reckoned with in the context of the Brāhmaṇa varṇa for the Śaivite priests. The Marathi Brāhmaṇas, it may be noted, do not trace their origin from Śiva. The Brāhmaṇas all over India claim to be human (mānava) in the tripartite scheme, ‘deva, dānava, and mānava’ They also trace their lineages (gotra) from the seers who are also mānavas. The Gurava’s claim to descent from Śiva himself violates this classification and hence puts them in conflict with the Brāhmaṇas.

One may question the need for a Śaivite version of the Puruṣasūkta myth and wonder at the total absence of the Guravas in it. It would seem that Jehurkar’s purpose is to undermine the Brāhmaṇa allegiance to the Vedas and to incorporate them into the Śaivite fold. Jehurkar wants to deny the Brāhmaṇas the claim that all their activities are vedokta. I have argued elsewhere (Bapat 1998) that the vedokta-purāṇokta distinction is the most critical element when denying Brāhmaṇic status to the Guravas. Jehurkar seems to imply that if the Guravas are not to be entitled to the Vedas, then let the Brāhmaṇas give up the Vedas in favor of Śiva. Under Śiva the Brāhmaṇas would have little ground on which to deny the Guravas their claim.

Chapter three, putatively derived from the Śaivaprabandha, describes the visage and greatness of Śiva. It also makes a curious reference to Śiva being the god of the Jains. Chapters four and five deal with the ritual procedures for a Tantric pūjā of Śiva. The sacredness and greatness of the five-lettered mantra, ‘namaḥ śivāya,’ and the six-lettered mantra, ‘oṃ namaḥ śivāya,’ are also explained. Finally, chapter six narrates the now-familiar story of Dadhici and his son Sudarśana and the birth of the Devalaka Brāhmaṇas, taken from the Jñāna Samhitā of the Śiva Purāṇa.

Taking chapters from various Āgamic texts, it appears that Jehurkar has a dual purpose in mind. Compilation from a variety of auspicious texts gives Jehurkar and his work a high scholarly status, respectability, and an impression of authenticity in the minds of Guravas and others, especially Brāhmaṇas. Furthermore, like Sitaram Dajiba Pande (the author of the Laghu Śaivāgama), Jehurkar is able to produce ślokas that clearly differentiate between the Guravas, who call themselves Brāhmaṇas, and the Liṅgāyats, who are looked down upon by the Guravas but who occupy priestly positions in many important Śiva temples in Maharashtra and Karnataka. Jehurkar is a mild-mannered scholar who seeks to persuade rather than disabuse the Brāhmaṇas.

GAURAVA

Gaurava is a recent publication in Hindi by Omdatta Arya from Madhya Pradesh. During an interview, Arya related that his forebears were Śaiva Guravas by caste who had arrived in Madhya Pradesh from Maharashtra with the Śiṇdes and the Holkars in the middle of the eighteenth century. Since Madhya Pradesh is a Hindi-speaking region, they adopted Ārya as their surname. The author indicates his Gurava origin on the first page of the booklet and believes that he is fortunate to have been born in the Gurava Brāhmaṇa caste. This modest text, thirty-one pages in seven chapters, was published by the author's late father, Nanuram Arya, at Kirti Printing Press, Ujjain, Madhya Pradesh, in 1981.

On the first page, Arya acknowledges his debt to his father, to Girijashankar Nirbhayaram, who wrote the Gujarati work Tapodhana Tattvaparakāśa, and to Chotelal Sharma, the author of Saptakhaṇḍī Jāti Nirṇaya. Both these works figure in the following discussion.

The only page of chapter one praises the greatness of Śiva. It claims that over 60 percent of Hindus are worshippers of Śiva, the 'god of gods.' To support this, Arya points out that Śiva's temples outnumber those of all the other gods put together. Śiva's greatness is further shown by indicating the sites of twelve Jyotirliṅga temples located throughout India.

The two pages of the second chapter illustrate the intimate relationship between the famous sage Dadhici and Śiva. A story is told of a quarrel between King Kṣuva and Dadhici about the status of Brāhmaṇas and Kṣatriyas. The king maintains that Kṣatriyas have more power and hence a higher status, but Dadhici disagrees. Eventually the king approaches Viṣṇu and is told that the Brāhmaṇas are indeed superior to Kṣatriyas. Arya says that because Dadhici, a Śiva devotee, was insulted during this episode by Kṣuva (with Viṣṇu's complicity), all the gods and goddesses had to suffer Śiva's anger during Dakṣa's sacrifice. Arya's aim is to show the superiority of the Brāhmaṇas who are devotees of Śiva over those who are devotees of Viṣṇu. Since the Guravas call themselves Śaiva Brāhmaṇas, the intention is to demonstrate their superiority.

Chapter three narrates the myth of King Vṛtra, who could only be killed by Indra with a weapon constructed from Dadhici's bones. This establishes Dadhici's great worth even to the gods. Arya then casually states that the descendants of Sudarśana, Dadhici's sons, are known as 'Gurava Brāhmaṇas' in Maharashtra and Madhya Pradesh and as 'Tapodhana Brāhmaṇas' in Gujarat.²⁹ He asserts that these are one and the same. As proof, he cites the ritual of sixteen Mondays (solāsomavāra vrata), a vow observed in Maharashtra, Madhya Pradesh, and Gujarat.³⁰ While the Marathi pothī (a manuscript or print made up of loose leaves) describing the vrata mentions a Gurava associated with the myth, the Gujarati version replaces the word 'gurava' with 'tapodhana.' After declaring that the Gurava and Tapodhana Brāhmaṇas are the same, Arya ends the chapter by reiterating that the Guravas and the Tapodhanas are the descendants of Dadhici and that the performance of Śiva's pūjā is their main function.

Chapters four and five demonstrate the raison d'être of Arya's book. In chapter four, he reproduces the Devalaka myth as found in Jñāna Saṃhitā 43 and 44. Arya argues that the ślokas that portray the Devalakas, and hence the Guravas, as Śūdras have been deliberately altered by jealous Brāhmaṇas. Several times in his work he draws a connection between the Guravas and Sudarśana. The arguments he uses and the ślokas he quotes (Jñāna Saṃhitā 44.1–41, 44.53–54, with comments) to prove his point are reproduced verbatim from the Tapodhana Tattvaparakāśa. Such careful cross-referencing demonstrates the scholarly depth of the work and augments his own argument.

The fifth chapter is devoted to a discussion of śivanirmālya. Arya says that by custom, the Brāhmaṇas in Maharashtra, Karnataka, and Madhya Pradesh do not accept offerings made to Śiva. He suggests in his commentary that this custom is nothing but a manifestation of the traditional rivalry between the Śaivites and the Vaiṣṇavites. To support his argument, he quotes the *Śaivasudhākara Candrikā*³¹ by the Śaṅkarācārya of Jyotir Maṭha (in the north):

Brāhmaṇas, Kṣatriyas and Vaiśyas are the twice-born varṇas. Many people among these varṇas have discarded their religion and have succumbed to false, heretic notions. As a result of this, they gave up Śiva-pūjā and are wary of accepting the offerings made to Śiva. Why should one accept the offerings made to Viṣṇu as prasādam and not those made to Śiva? The notion of not consuming śivaprasādam is obviously perpetuated by those who hate Śiva (22)..

The Śaṅkarācārya supports his opinion by quoting several verses from the Kaurmakhanda Purāṇa.³² Here is one such verse:

O Arjuna! Those Brāhmaṇas who were cursed by the goddess at the time of Dakṣa's sacrifice will be reborn as Brāhmaṇas dominated by the tamogūṇa. These Brāhmaṇas will be heretics and will slander Śiva in the Kali Yuga (22).

According to that same Purāṇa, Dadhici warns Dakṣa that all those who hate Śiva will act against the tenets of the Vedas, will subscribe to false notions about the Dharmaśāstras, and will have to endure much sadness in the Kali Yuga. They will go to various hells after their death. In the Kali Yuga, they will all worship Viṣṇu and will oppose Śiva's worship. Arya mentions that the Śaṅkarācārya of Dvārakā in Gujarat also made similar remarks about śivanirmālya.

The next three pages describe the importance of śivanirmālya for Śiva devotees and particularly for the Guravas who have the god-ordained right to the offerings made to Śiva. Once again, Arya uses the arguments and verses by Girijashankar Nirbhayaram to support the propriety of the consumption of śivanirmālya by the worshipper as well as the officiating priest.

Chapter six of the Gaurava deals with the origin of the Gurava Brāhmaṇas. Arya quotes the Saptakhaṇḍī Jāti Nirṇaya which suggests that Gurava is a caste of Brāhmaṇas in South India and Madhya Pradesh and that the name Gurava came from the word 'gaurava,' meaning admiration and respect. The temple priests were treated with great respect by people.³³

Arya's purpose for devoting a substantial part of a chapter to Saptakhaṇḍī Jāti Nirṇaya seems to be twofold. First, as the compiler of the work was a Brāhmaṇa, his opinion about the Guravas' Brāhmaṇahood would carry substantial weight. Second, the compilation was a major effort in several volumes organized by the Hindu Dharma Varṇa Vyavasthā Maṇḍala, which reached most parts of India. The mention of the Guravas' Brāhmaṇahood in this kind of work would signal acceptance by the wider community of Hindus.

Arya reiterates that other Brāhmaṇas envied the status of the Guravas and, therefore, 'spread many rumors about them which were, of course, blatantly false' (27).

The last chapter consists of a single page which provides some details about Dadhici's birth anniversary and quotes the Śivagāyatrī-mantra.³⁴

Arya is a reasonable scholar who skillfully argues that the jealousy and envy of other Marathi Brāhmaṇas is the cause of their contention with the Guravas. He uses no abusive language and not much Sanskrit scholarship, although he seems well aware of the presence of relevant works in Sanskrit.

THE GURUVARYA GURAVA KATHĀMṚTA OR ŚIVAMAHIMECĪ NANDĀVRATAKATHĀ

The last of the Gurava Jātipurāṇas was written in Marathi by a Gurava, Sangitācārya Shankar Guruji in 1992, and was published by his wife, Shanta Gurava, at Comp-Print Kalpana Press, Pune. It consists of five adhyāyas, totaling sixty-three pages in printed book format. Shankar Guruji suggests that the material in this Purāṇa was obtained from the Śambholiṅga Purāṇa, composed in Kannada.³⁵

The Śivamahimecī Nandāvratakathā's prefatory pages contain dedicatory photographs and include the written dedication by the author, his own photograph, and another dedicatory verse addressed to his guru. As well, the preface includes a note from the publisher (his wife) and a biographical statement about the author. There is a list of Gurava patronymics, each containing the term 'guru,' and a parallel list of Śiva's paraphernalia, such as his weapons and items of worship. Next are a stotram (hymn) worshipping Śiva as the guru, an appeal to observe the Nandā vrata, and the call for vidhi to perform it. The Ṛg Veda, the Śvetāśvatara Upaniṣad, the Bhāgavata Purāṇa, the Bhagavad Gītā, and the Rāmcaritmānas are all invoked to detail the greatness of Śiva. Such long prefaces are not unusual in religious books sold in many bāzārs outside large temples all over India. Such extraneous material is absent in the Sanskrit Purāṇas, and thus this work must be considered modern.

The language of the notes and the main text is in the simplest Marathi, but, as would befit a Jñāna Purāṇa, there are invocations to Gaṇeśa, Sarasvatī, Śaṅkara, and Pārvatī, the author's parents, all the gods, and the Gauravas. However, his Sanskrit grammar is faulty. At the end of each adhyāya, there is a closing formula and the statement, 'Announce the great victory of the god of gods, Hara.' At the end are three Marathi āratis, which indicate verbal offerings to be sung at Śiva's pūjā.

The Nandāvratakathā differs from other Gurava Jātipurāṇas we have examined because the author makes no use of the Devalaka myth. Instead, the author narrates two alternative myths about the origin of the Śaiva Guravas. It is significant that, by 1992, at least some of the Śaiva Guravas were unwilling to admit to the transgression of their putative forebear, Sudarśana. The Nandā-vratākathā contains no record of any transgression by the Gurava ancestor.

In his introduction, Shankar Guruji asserts that many great men were born in the Gurava community. Because of their adherence to dharma, the Śaiva Brāhmaṇas experience the universal god and show the way to salvation. One should therefore trust in their ways, and, like them, one should perform vratas and worship god. (He reproduces in detail my own interview about the Guravas published in Sakāla [December 1, 1991], detailing the stone inscriptions and the meetings between the Guravas and the Śaṅkarācārya.)³⁶ He lists twenty-one ‘ancient’ surnames that he claims are those of the Guravas. He seems to be unaware that, unlike gotra identity, the possession of patronymic surnames is not an Indian practice; such surnames were not usual before the time of the British. Furthermore, none of these are used as surnames by contemporary Guravas.

Shankar Guruji outlines the Nandā vrata, which involves bathing the Śiva līṅga under flowing water for five minutes while chanting the Śivapañcākṣari-mantra. A detailed ṣoḍaśapacāra-pūjā of Śiva follows. This procedure is to be repeated on twenty-one consecutive Mondays. On the twenty-second Monday, a Gurava is invited to recite the story of the vrata.³⁷ If possible, a silver Śiva līṅga should be presented to the Gurava priest.

The first adhyāya of the text relates the story of Dakṣa and his sacrifice. When Satī throws herself into the fire, Śiva retires to the forest to practice austerities. As Śiva performs these terrible austerities, his sweat falls to the ground, and a beautiful male child is born of it. The second adhyāya continues the same story. The special boy is nurtured by Mother Earth and hence comes to be called Bhomeśvaranātha. He became a great devotee of Śiva. By the age of fourteen, he performed the Nandā vrata. He assumed the role of a teacher and started giving discourses on Śaivism at Kāśī. His fame spread. People all over the world praised him, but this caused jealousy amongst some paṇḍitas. The daughter of the sage Praṇava, Vidyāvati, attended his discourses and fell in love with him. She desired to marry him, but her father was jealous of Bhomeśvaranātha, and he refused to allow the marriage. Seeing her daughter’s grief, Vidyāvati’s mother advised her to perform the Nandā vrata.

One day, the story goes, King Gabhastī of Kāśī organized a musical concert. Praṇava was proud of his singing prowess and challenged one and all to compete with him. Bhomeśvaranātha took up the challenge. He came forward, recited Śiva’s five-lettered mantra, and then sang. His singing was so enchanting that the celestial singers and dancers showered flowers upon him from the sky. Praṇava, furious and insulted, left the gathering. Later, the Earth herself, as Bhomeśvaranātha’s mother, approached the sage and asked for Vidyāvati's hand for her son. But the sage had only revenge in mind. He consented to their union, but on the actual occasion of the wedding, he told the eager Bhomeśvaranātha that the wedding would not take place, 'for he had neither a father nor a gotra.' He added that Bhomeśvaranātha was an utter fool to expect to marry Vidyāvati. He questioned his education and the Vedas he had studied. The groom-to-be replied that his father was Śiva himself and his mother was the Earth. He replied that he had studied the Yajur Veda and was a Śaiva Brāhmaṇa. He had also learned the Sāma Veda and music. Praṇava ṛṣi scoffed at his answers. However, at this juncture, the sage Nārada, Nandikeśvara (the bull of Śiva), and Śiva's gaṇas appeared and vouched for the truth of Bhomeśvaranātha's statements. Praṇava relented and consented to the wedding, which then took place with great ceremony and pomp.

Adhyāya three tells us that Bhomeśvaranātha left his pregnant wife for the Himālayas in order to practice austerities. In due course, Vidyāvati delivered a son while she was praying at the Bhairavanātha temple. Śiva appeared before her, blessed the child, and told her that because her son was born in the Bhairavanātha temple, he would be known by that name. The son also grew to be a great Śiva devotee.

Bhomeśvaranātha remained contented meditating in the Himālayas, Śiva's abode. One day, as Śiva was playing on his drum, it fell to the ground and broke. Bhomeśvaranātha quickly repaired it. The delighted god told Bhomeśvaranātha that he and his descendants would henceforth become proficient at repairing musical instruments. Bhomeśvaranātha also made many garlands for Pārvatī. Pleased with this, the goddess told Bhomeśvaranātha that he would be known as Phulāgri or Phulāri. Picking flowers for Śiva and the goddess and making garlands would become his and his descendants' chosen vocation.

Meanwhile, Bhomeśvaranātha's son Bhairavanātha married Śaivavati and spent time in the worship of Śiva. He established many Śiva līngas on the banks of rivers and performed many sacrifices. He established a Śiva līnga at the source of the Mandākinī River in the Himālayas and constructed a Śiva temple for it. The fame of Bhairavanātha spread everywhere, and people flocked to worship at the temple.

Indra resolved to test Bhairavanātha's devotion to Śiva, and he appeared before him, disguised as a Brāhmaṇa guest who refused to eat with Bhairavanātha. He told Bhairavanātha that because his wife Śaivavati had no children, she was not fit to serve food to a Brāhmaṇa. Śaivavati was greatly distressed and was advised by her husband to perform the Nandā vrata.

Bhairavanātha himself went to Mount Kailāsa and prayed to Śiva with great devotion but to no avail. In despair, Bhairavanātha jumped off a cliff, but Śiva gently picked him up and conferred several boons upon him. The god declared Bhairavanātha his greatest devotee on earth and decreed that the pūjā performed by him would be the most important pūjā for Śiva. Furthermore, the text states that the offerings made to Śiva by other devotees would belong to Bhairavanātha. Whatever favor Bhairavanātha asked on behalf of the devotee during a pūjā would be granted. The cliff from where he jumped would be known as Bhairavazep (the place of Bhairava's jump).³⁸ Śiva told Bhairavanātha that he would for ever be adored by people and that his name will have the suffix 'Gaurava.' Saying this Śiva disappeared. All the gods, including Indra, showered flowers on Bhairavanātha. When he returned home everyone rejoiced. Śaivavati had also completed her vrata, and with Śiva's blessing, five sons were born to her. The third adhyāya concludes with a phalaśruti verse enjoining all to recite the text.

The fourth adhyāya tells the story of the five sons of Bhairavanātha, four of whom—Gurunātha, Amarnātha, Somanātha, and Umākānta—married and went, according to their father's wish, to the four corners of the world to establish Śiva lingas. The fifth son, Candrakānta, married his cousin, Madhuvantī, and lived in a forest near Dvārakā. The couple had a son called Kumāra. When he was five, his upanayana was performed in accordance with Śaiva Brāhmaṇa customs.³⁹ He too became a great Śiva devotee.

One day, Nandikeśvara decided to test Kumāra's devotion. Under the guise of a ṛṣi, he came to the temple where Kumāra's father was performing Śiva's pūjā. Kumāra was picking flowers and bel leaves for the pūjā when he was bitten by a snake. He lay dying in the temple garden. His mother Madhuvantī came out in the garden, saw her son lying unconscious, and was grief-stricken. However, as it was pūjā time, she collected flowers and bel leaves herself and performed the pūjā along with her husband. Both of them then humbly invited all the gathered devotees to eat with them. However, Nandikeśvara, in the guise of a ṛṣi, insisted on their calling Kumāra to dinner as well. The distraught mother was forced into calling Kumāra and was surprised when he came in without showing any signs of poisoning.⁴⁰ Nandikeśvara then assumed his usual bull form, and all the gathered devotees offered him prayers. The sage Nārada appeared and told Candrakānta, Madhuvantī, and Kumāra that they all deserved adoration (gaurava) and that Lord Śiva himself had named them 'Gaurava.' He said, 'Your actions befit your name. Kumāra will make your kula famous, and he himself will become a great Śiva devotee' (46).

Kumāra became such an ardent worshipper that at his pūjā, Śiva always appeared in person and ate with him.⁴¹ When his father Candrakānta found this out, he was ecstatic. Śiva told the father and the son that their ardent devotion earned them the right to consume the offerings to Śiva.

The fifth adyāya tells the story of Bhairavanātha's third son, Somnātha, who went to Andhra and was enchanted by Terāvati,⁴² the daughter of the Nāgārjuna and the Śrīgiri Mountains. He marries her. He gathered all the people on the banks of the Pinākinī River, and with their help, he established a Śiva līṅga there. He lived close by at Nādabalāpuram. With Śiva's blessing he fathered eleven sons whose initiation was performed according to Gurava customs. They were also given training in the Vedas and Vedic rituals. Ten of them were sent to Karnataka. The eleventh son Śubhaṅkara was also an ardent Śiva devotee, and he became very famous. The king of Nādabalāpuram, Vinābhramaṇa, had a daughter named Vijayā. One day, travelling in her chariot, she noticed Śubhaṅkara carrying some beautiful flowers. The princess demanded the flowers be put in her chariot, and Śubhaṅkara could come and collect money for them from the palace the next day. Śubhaṅkara refused, saying that they were for Śiva's pūjā and so he would not sell them at any price. The furious princess confiscated the flowers. Her guards arrested Śubhaṅkara and put him in prison. Somnātha went to the king to inquire what had happened, but the king also put the father behind bars. Even in prison, the father and the son continued to pray to Śiva.

Next day, Vijayā fell from her horse and disfigured her face badly. She was engaged to be married to the prince of Yāmkona. Upon learning of her disfigurement, the prince refused to marry her. To make matters worse, the king of Yāmkona declared war on Vinābhramaṇa in the hope of annexing the latter's kingdom. King Vinābhramaṇa was most distressed, and he reasoned that his bad luck was because the gods were displeased with him. His advisors told him to pray to Śiva in the nearby temple of Siddheśvara on the banks of Pinākinī River. The king begged Śiva to forgive him for the mistakes he had made. The god told him to release Somnātha and Śubhaṅkara immediately and make the son his guru.

The king released them and gave them clothes, money, and ornaments. He washed their feet and sprinkled the waste water on Vijayā's face. She regained her beauty and then performed the Nandā vrata. Later, she married the prince of Yāmkona. Śubhaṅkara became rājaguru and provided a source of wisdom, joy and strength for the king.

In a footnote to the chapter, the sons of Somnātha and Śubhaṅkara went to Karnataka and came to be known as 'Gaurava.' Later, they migrated to Maharashtra, and the name 'Gaurava' changed to 'Gurava.' The present-day Guravas in Karnataka wear white cloth,⁴³ smear their foreheads with bhasma, wear a necklace of five-sided rudrākṣa beads, and chant the Śivapañcākṣarī-mantra, 'namaḥ śivāya.' They carry a Śiva līṅga upon their person. The Maharashtrian Guravas, on the other hand, put a sandalwood mark in place of bhasma on the forehead and wear the sacred thread in place of a Śiva līṅga.

Shankar Guruji stresses that there is no difference between the two, and they do intermarry.⁴⁴ The Purāṇa ends here.

The plot structure of Nandāvratakathā

The plot of the Nandāvratakathā is structured in genealogical fashion and details the offering of absolute devotion to Śiva of each generation by both central and incidental characters. The genealogy begins with Śiva himself and mentions Dakṣa's yajña, a sacrifice that is archetypal of the conflict between Dakṣa, the Brāhmaṇa, and Śiva. Among the five generations, devotion is tested and always ends in various boons granted by Śiva himself. The boons confer upon Kumāra (and hence his progeny, the Gurava, forever) the profession of music, the mending of the musical instruments, the right to grow and provide flowers for pūjā, the right to first pūjā, the right to nirmālya offerings, and the right to ask favors of Śiva on behalf of the devotees. At no point in the narrative are the devotees (called Gauravas or Guravas) referred explicitly as Brāhmaṇas or even associated with Brahmagāyatrī, despite being associated with the Vedas, upanayana, marriage to the daughter of a ṛṣi, and so on. The text and its author are both diffident in that they withhold from making an explicit claim to Brāhmaṇahood. They do this by omitting the twin defining characteristics of Brāhmaṇahood, namely, the right to recite the Brahmagāyatrī (homage to the Sun) and the cosmic initial sound 'om' that precedes it. Moreover, the only mantra mentioned in association with this group is the 'namaḥ śivāya'—note the significant omission of om, a sound which implies the Vedas.

METHODS OF AUTHENTICITY IN GURAVA JĀTIPURĀṆAS

As a sacred text, a Jātipurāṇa is designed to fulfill the cultural aspirations and needs of the specific group of people. The myths told in these Purāṇas are understood as facts for claims of original and true caste status, invariably higher than their present position. In other words, the Jātipurāṇas play an important role in lodging the claim to higher status on the part of the caste involved. To attain such an authoritative position, a Jātipurāṇa must appear to be authentic both in terms of convergence with the traditionally sanctioned, if fictionalized, social history and of being a part of the caste tradition (paramparā) of those castes seeking the new status. Claims are submitted to either the religious or the civil authorities who have the influence to rule over such matters.

The Laghu Śaivāgama, the Sthūla Śaivāgama, the Gaurava, and the Nandāvratakathā were all written by Guravas, in their own words. They were conceived by the Gurava community to publicly counter the humiliating identification with the Śūdras⁴⁵ propagated by the Marathi Brāhmaṇas. Except in the case of the Nandāvratakathā, the other Jātipurāṇa authors collected relevant Sanskrit ślokas, especially from the Śiva Purāṇa, compiled them into chapters, and added the Devalaka myth. The Laghu Śaivāgama and the Sthūla Śaivāgama added extensive commentaries in Marathi, and the Gaurava in Hindi. The author of the Nandāvratakathā composed his text in prose. However, he did use Marathi and Sanskrit prayers in the beginning and at the end of the work to imitate the Purāṇic style and to create an impression of traditional authenticity. All four authors have, therefore, found an authoritative mark by using a Purāṇa-like structure in their polemics. Their chapters are adhyāyas as the Purāṇas are, and their works begin with homage to Śiva, Gaṇeśa, or another deity. They all claim that the material they present was obtained from the śāstras and the Purāṇas and that they are mere collectors and presenters of ancient and divine lore.

The Gurava writers published the stories that apparently all Gurava and Marathi Brāhmaṇas knew from oral tradition. Therefore, they did not feel the need to authenticate the stories by direct reference to the Purāṇas. Their use of Sanskrit verses mainly meant to clothe their work in scholarly garb. However, the Devalaka Kathāmṛta goes beyond this. It was authored not by a Gurava but by a Brāhmaṇa, Balshastri Upasani. His work contains most of the marks that define a Purāṇa. As tradition demands, Upasani sought legitimacy through a much closer adherence to the Purāṇic form. He links his work directly to an ancient text like the Śiva Purāṇa, thus bringing sanction to his work through tradition (paramparā). It makes his work appear as authentic as the Śiva Purāṇa. Stylistically, he models the Devalaka Kathāmṛta on the Śiva Purāṇa story, claiming that what he had to say was not at all new; it had appeared in the śāstras before, and he was a mere mortal ordered by the god to produce the work. Hence his claim that Gaṇeśa, the auspicious, Sarasvatī, the goddess of learning, and Vālmiki,⁴⁶ the author of the Rāmāyaṇa, appeared in visions before him and sanctioned his work. But the Purāṇic formula demands humility of all mortal authors, and Upasani says, 'He knew that as an author he was most inferior, but he was also convinced that God would forgive him for his transgression.' Veena Das suggests that this formal expression of humility can be understood in terms of the 'canons of legitimization in traditional Sanskrit learning' (1967–68: 152).⁴⁷ She also submits that later authors normally graft their work on celebrated older authors in order to make their own words appear authentic. This practice/device is absent in the Devalaka Kathāmṛta. We do not know whether this is due to the reluctance on the part of Upasani to accord this level of authenticity to his own statements and thereby concretize the Gurava claim.

Upasani employed the same diction as found in Sanskrit Purāṇas, although his work is in Marathi. The next step in the legitimization process is to identify the Devalaka as the temple priest of ancient times. His purpose is to explain why the Guravas are Brāhmaṇas in spite of their current Śūdra ways. He achieves this in a legitimization of the present status of the Guravas through his identification with the Purāṇic Devalaka. We are told that Sudarśana's failing, Śiva's curse, and the restoration of Sudarśana as Śiva's premier devotee is accompanied by the loss of the right to Vedic mantras. This is the price paid for Sudarśana's sin. Being a select devotee, Sudarśana and his descendants are allowed to keep the offerings made by other devotees to Śiva for their own use. A justification is created for the Guravas to accept money and other gifts for their services. The myth legitimizes the Guravas' entitlement to accept money, whereas the use of the Purāṇic genre simply cements the whole story within a Purāṇic, hence Brāhmaṇical, framework.

The myth that the Guravas wish to refute may be summarized as follows: the Brāhmaṇas argue that all Brāhmaṇas have a particular style of life; the Guravas do not share this style. Therefore the Guravas are not Brāhmaṇas. The Guravas argue that they are Brāhmaṇas. However, they allow that they fell into non-Brāhmaṇa ways due to a sin committed by their ancestor. Expiation followed and the price was paid. This does not, however, affect their status as Brāhmaṇas.⁴⁸

The author of the Nandāvrata kathā deals with matters of authenticity and validation differently than the other authors. His Purāṇa seeks to justify, as traditionally sanctioned, what the Guravas are doing at present. He must explain the Gurava claim to Brāhmaṇahood, since Guravas perform non-Brāhmaṇic tasks, such as acting as musicians, repairing and selling musical instruments, collecting and selling flowers and bel leaves, and accepting offerings made to Śiva by other devotees. In keeping with the other authors, he starts his book by saluting Śiva, Pārvatī, Gaṇeśa, Sarasvatī, and his own parents. Beyond that, he uses to his advantage neither Sanskrit nor tradition. In broken Sanskrit he salutes, uncharacteristically, all the Śaiva Guravas who are gods of gods. He then seeks the blessings of Pārvatī and her inspiration for the work. The proverbial sūta now appears, and it is he who delivers the entire discourse of this kathā. In line with all the other Purāṇas, each adhyāya ends with 'Here ends adhyāya X of the Guruvarya Gaurava Kathāmṛta, Hail to Śiva.'

The Gurava claim to Brāhmaṇahood is supported by Bhomeśvara who claims that he is a Yajurvedi Śaiva Brāhmaṇa, his parents being Śiva and Mother Earth themselves. This claim parallels Sudarśana's claim to be Śiva's adopted son.

The appearance of the sage Nārada and Nandikeśvara at Bhomeśvara's wedding and the acceptance of Bhomeśvara as his son-in-law by the sage Praṇava authenticate and seal Bhomeśvara's claim to Brāhmaṇahood.

The author of the Nandāvratakathā is aware that the Gurava professions of picking and selling flowers, selling bel leaves, and repairing and playing musical instruments—tasks which necessitate contact with hide—are non-Brāhmaṇa professions that speak against the Guravas' Brāhmaṇahood. The need exists to explain away these aberrations. This is what is spoken to when Bhomeśvara repairs Śiva's drum and makes garlands for Pārvatī. It is the gods themselves who decree that the Guravas become expert in these crafts. Thus two non-Brāhmaṇic professions become the Brāhmaṇa Guravas' god-ordained duties.⁴⁹ Another non-Brāhmaṇic practice on the part of the Guravas is in the acceptance of the offerings made to Śiva by other devotees for their own use, something most Brāhmaṇas refuse to do. While the other Purāṇas explain this as a boon given to Sudarśana, the Nandāvratakathā explains it as a boon given to Kumāra, the grandson of Bhomeśvara. The story also makes Śiva eat with Kumāra every day and gives the first right to the food to the progeny of Kumāra, the Guravas. One finds in this an echo of the tale of King Bhadrāsena. The Guravas are thus Śiva's and Pārvatī's select devotees, and the non-Brāhmaṇa acts they perform are completed because of Śiva's orders and boons. The Guravas' profession and conduct are thus totally vindicated, legitimized, and authenticated. The Purāṇa, however, has no explanation as to why the Guravas are considered Śūdras in Maharashtra, apart from saying that it is due to the jealousy of the Brāhmaṇas. All in all, the Nandāvratakathā is a Purāṇa of the triumphant Guravas.

THE JĀTIPURĀṆAS AS A REFLECTION OF HISTORICAL CHANGE

The Jātipurāṇas reviewed, as a whole, reflect a significant cultural change as evidenced by the actions of the Gurava writers. The Devalaka Kathāmṛta, the Sthūla Śaivāgama, and the Laghu Śaivāgama were written and published in the first decade of the twentieth century. Prior to this, attempts to elevate one's caste had been confined to appeals to religious authorities such as the Śaṅkarācārya. This was at least in part because the Guravas could not expect the Koṅkaṇastha Brāhmaṇa Peśvās to admit them into the Brāhmaṇa varṇa. In fact, the Peśvās had occasionally taken away temple priesthood from them.

The instatement of the British colonial government provided the Gauravas with their first opportunity both in terms of allowing them access to their offices and their courts and of the benefits provided by ethnographic and census activities. Yet the British, in their desire to establish an authentic Indian society and culture needed to be convinced, through Sanskrit and śāstric scholarship, that the Guravas were indeed Brāhmaṇas. The Gurava leaders understood this, and they initially employed Brāhmaṇas to write their Jātipurāṇas. It is at this stage that their appeals were tied to, or rather fashioned after, their generic myth.

The Gauravas mounted other attacks on the Brāhmaṇa view, sometimes acting on their own without the Brāhmaṇas, but still Sanskrit (with Marathi commentary) is the language of the debate. Pande and Jehurkar are cast in the traditional vivāda role, but one should keep in mind that the Peśvās would not have permitted neither a vitriolic, intemperate tone nor an anti-Brāhmaṇic interpretation of the Devalaka myth, still less the abandonment of it altogether. The critical issue of caste was taken up by the people who were not so much trying to be accepted as Brāhmaṇas as they were seeking an escape from Brāhmaṇa denigration altogether by attempting to join them.

The other two Jātipurāṇas, written seven and eight decades later respectively, are secondary material which support initial claims, one might say almost Gurava praśāsti. It now matters less to them who Sudarśana was or what should be done by way of reinterpretation to escape the status disability visited upon them through the myth. The Nandāvratakathā is, in fact, a series of triumphs of each generation of the Gurava ancestors. The Gaurava is not unique in its proclamation of self-respect. The Brāhmaṇas, despite universal acceptance of their primacy in the ritual and religious arena, do periodically demand explicit respect from the others.

To put it even more abstractly, I might say that the Guravas became free from the social control of the Brāhmaṇas the moment they started to write for themselves. From then on, despite the content of their writing, the significant others became only themselves and the aim became achieving self-respect. The real significance of Gurava microhistory thus lies in the progressive assertiveness of the successive Jātipurāṇas that they authored or caused to be authored.

Notes

1. I have used the words 'jāti' and 'caste' interchangeably in this paper.
2. The story of Ārya Kṣatriyas is found in a charter given to the coppersmiths of Pandharpur in 1857 by the then Śaṅkarācārya of Śrīṅgeri. The charter was published with some additional material in the form of a booklet by the Brāhmaṇa Narayan Ramchandra Raste.

3. These gotras are also held by Brāhmaṇas and often by Kṣatriyas. All Marathi, Hindi, and Sanskrit translations are my own unless otherwise indicated.

4. The logic naturally extends beyond the text and is to be seen in the form of social action on the part of the contestant group.

5. It is interesting to speculate whether Upasani knew about the Tapodhanas, the counterparts of the Guravas in Gujarat.

6. In the Jñāna Saṃhitā, Sudarśana's wife is named Duṣkalpā. In all three Gurava Jātipurāṇas, Duṣkulā has been portrayed as the instigator of the sin (pāpa) of having intercourse on a holy day. Laying the blame on her is a strategy by which the authors keep the blame away from Sudarśana. In Purāṇic literature, lay women are routinely considered inferior, polluting, and inauspicious.

7. Upasani comments here that, as it is, women are inauspicious and polluted. On top of this, Duṣkulā came from a sinful family. It was, therefore, hardly surprising that Duṣkulā's husband Sudarśana would entertain sinful thoughts as well (Devalaka Kathāmṛta p.16).

8. The Purāṇa does not say why Sudarśana returned to earth.

9. The Śivagāyatrī-mantra is 'tatpuruṣāya vidmahe mahādevāya dhīmahi tanno rudraḥ pracodayāt.' The Vedic mantra given to the Brāhmaṇas at upanayana (sacred thread ceremony) is the Gāyatrī-mantra addressed to Savitr, the sun-god. Neither the Śiva Purāṇa nor the Gurava Jātipurāṇas explain why Sudarśana, the son of a Brāhmaṇa ṛṣi, Dadhici, received the Śivagāyatrī-mantra.

10. Ṣoḍaśapacāra-pūjā is the complete sixteen-part worship that can be offered to any god.

11. It is significant to see that the word 'gurava' appears only in the Gurava Jātipurāṇas; the Śiva Purāṇa mentions only the Devalaka (temple priest). As the Guravas are the contemporary temple priests, they claim to be the descendants of Sudarśana and made the change from Devalaka to Gurava. The point is that the Maharashtrian Guravas do need to bridge the gap between themselves and the Purāṇic Devalakas.

12. The word baṭu is used for a child undergoing upanayana ceremony, not otherwise in everyday speech.

13. Neither the Śiva Purāṇa nor the Gurava Jātipurāṇas explain why the Śiva temple priest has to be different from the other Brāhmaṇas in terms of the tilaka marks. Hence my interpretation.

14. Few modern-day Guravas seem even to know about the existence of this Purāṇa, let alone read it daily.

15. The progeny of a Brāhmaṇa by a Kṣatriya woman, a pratiloma union.

16. One notes here a thematic similarity between the Devalaka Kathāmṛta and the Ārya Kṣatriya myth quoted earlier. The sin of the Ārya Kṣatriyas is the violation of their Kṣatriya duty of protecting the ṛṣis. In Sudarśana's case, the sin is Brāhmaṇic in character. In both stories, it is Śiva who is angered and later placated. In both, the sons of Śiva or Pārvatī are involved, and it is the father who intervenes successfully.

17. This Purāṇa is now out of print. I am grateful to Ganesh Suradkar, a Gurava from Aurangabad, who made his personal copy available to me. It was in a very poor state and several pages following page forty-four were either missing or half torn.

18. A Paṇḍā (plural Paṇḍe) is a lower-class Brāhmaṇa temple priest in various parts of India, including the famous shrine of Kāśīviśveśvara at Benares and Paṇḍharpura in Maharashtra. Marathi Brāhmaṇas definitely class the Paṇḍharpur Pande as lower-class Brāhmaṇas, whereas they insist that a Gurava belongs to the Śūdra caste. It is significant to see a Gurava taking this name.

19. Dvijās are those who belong to the Brāhmaṇa, Kṣatriya, and Vaiśya varṇas. This is the first instance I have seen where the Guravas have called themselves dvijās. As to why Pande calls himself a dvija rather than a Śaiva Brāhmaṇa is unclear. Since Marathi Brāhmaṇas call the Guravas Śūdras, this may well be an attempt by him to stress their non-Śūdra status.

20. Devarāṣṭrīya (Devarukhe) are lower-class Brāhmaṇas in Maharashtra.

21. I have not come across the book Karmavipāka. Pande's reference to the Tristhalīsetu seems puzzling. The only book I know with this title is the one by Narayanabhatta (1985) that deals with tīrtha and pilgrimage. It does not mention Citapāvana Brāhmaṇas at all.

21. This assertion of Pande seems untrue. The Citapāvana and the Karhāde Brāhmaṇas are certainly not ritually barred from any Vedic duties. It may, however, be that when he was alive, a person from these castes may have abandoned Brāhmaṇic practices.

23. 'Upādhye' or 'upādhyāya' is the term used for the family priest in Maharashtra. Each family has an upādhyāya who is invited to the family home for conducting life-cycle rituals.

24. It must be remembered that only the claim to the first worship in the morning and the last worship at night is ceded by Marathi Brāhmaṇas. If the Guravas claim to be 'gurus' to the people, such a claim would fall within the ambit of non-Vedic paramparā.

25. Pande recounts the tale of a Kannada Brāhmaṇa who had stayed with him. The Brāhmaṇa, upon hearing Pande's assertion about the Guravas' Brāhmaṇahood, asked Pande if he knew of any Marathi books that mentioned the Guravas as Śiva temple priests. Pande produced a book called Ṣoḍaśenduvāsara, which did in fact say so. The Brāhmaṇa apparently already knew this and, as further proof of the Guravas' greatness and profession, produced a book called Jātimālā by Narayanabhattacha, a text which also confirms it. I was unable to locate either of the books.

26. This is not one of the major Śaivāgamas but probably a minor Śaivite text; I was unable to locate it.

27. It is not clear where Pande obtained this story of the origin of the Śaiva Brāhmaṇas. It does not appear in any of the sources that I have come across thus far.

28. I was unable to find the exact Mughal king of this legend.

29. This reflects a theme of transcending regional boundaries. Many a caste seems to have done this in the 1920s and 1930s under the influence of the Hindu nationalist ideology.

30. This is a very popular kāmya ritual (a ritual where the devotee makes a vow in order to obtain a material reward) for Śiva, performed both by men and women all over India on sixteen consecutive Mondays. It involves fasting during the day, followed by a pūjā at night. On the seventeenth Monday, the end of the vrata, a major pūjā to Śiva is performed and sixteen Brāhmaṇas are fed. The ritual was taught to a Śiva devotee by a celestial apsarā. The devotee is called Gurava (Marathi and Hindi popular religious literature) and Tapodhana (Gujarati popular religious literature). On the other hand, the Vratarāja mentions only a Śiva gaṇa called 'Deval.' Once, while Śiva and Pārvatī were playing chess, they made a Śiva devotee a referee. In spite of Pārvatī winning the game many times, the referee, being partial to Śiva, declared that he had won every time. The angry goddess cursed him that he would develop leucoderma. A celestial apsarā advised him to perform this ritual in order to rid himself of the disease. The name Deval, for the Śiva devotee, is etymologically related to Devalaka.

31. I was unable to locate this work.

32. This Purāṇa is not included in the available works on Purāṇas, and I was unable to locate it.

33. While the etymological linking of the word 'gurava' to 'gaurava' is correct, the Jātipurāṇas are replete with such efforts. Linking, however spuriously, is in fact an important legitimizing device of Gurava status.

34. Arya quotes 'om tatpuruṣāya vidmahe mahādevāya dhīmahi tanno rudraḥ pracodayāt' as the Śivagāyatrī-mantra and says that Pande, the author of the Laghu Śaivāgama, asks people to chant this while making oblations to the sun. Arya has included om, the Vedic praṇava mantra.

35. A copy of the Śambhoḷiṅga Purāṇa is said to be available with one Shanmukhaswami Jangama in the village of Chinugundi near Jamkhindi. (Shankar Guruji told me that the Purāṇa is ancient and is written in old Kannada.) The Jaṅgama apparently translated the gist of it for Shankar Guruji. I was unable to contact this Jaṅgama personally.

36. I gave this interview to the newspaper to give notice that I was interested in meeting all those who had an interest in the Guravas. This is an interesting twist in that the researcher's own work is quoted back by his informant.

37. Normally, a Brāhmaṇa is invited to perform a pūjā and then give a discourse on a myth related to the particular ritual. I have not heard of a Gurava being invited to take the place of a Brāhmaṇa in this fashion. The purpose here must obviously be to equate the Gurava with the Brāhmaṇa in terms of ritual importance.

38. In a footnote, the author says, "If you travel from Haridvāra via Gaurī-kunḍa, the track becomes very difficult. Near Urvi is a Śiva temple established by Bhairavanātha. Further on, after Kedārnātha, one comes across Bhairavazep cliff. While it is there even today, only a true Śiva devotee will be brave enough to go there. It snows there continuously.'

39. Śaiva Brāhmaṇas (Guravas) do have a muñj (upanayana) ceremony, but it is no different from that of other Marathi Brāhmaṇas. As they are considered Śūdras, the muñj of Guravas is performed in the purāṇokta, not the vedokta, way.

40. This story has a familiar ring. It is similar to the story of the child Śrīyāla and his parents.

41. One may note here that another Kumāra is Kārttikeya, Śiva's own son, born of Pārvaṭī to kill the demon Tārakāsura.

42. The tale has a striking similarity to Śiva's wedding to Pāravatī, the daughter of Himālaya.

43. This seems to be puzzling. I know of no Gurava in Karnataka who dresses this way.

44. This seems unlikely because, as far as I am aware, only the Liṅgāyats wear the Śiva liṅga around their neck, and there is no intermarriage between them and the Guravas.

45. The presence of a written work in the socioreligious context carried great weight in the past. It could be used to advantage in a personal argument. Sometimes the simple claim to have such a work about one's caste added to the collective prestige of the caste. If not the Brāhmaṇas, such a work would impress other lower castes and attract respect from them.

46. The choice of Vālmīki instead of Vyāsa is interesting. Vālmīki came from a low caste. There is a caste that claims to be Vālmīki Brāhmaṇas, those who perform the rites of untouchables.

47. The canons of legitimation that such authors use are as follows: The sanction is sought through tradition. The work is never claimed to be new.

When written by a mortal, it is to be ordained by God. God appears in a vision and commands the author to compose the work. The author seeks forgiveness both from God and the readers.

48. An alternative conclusion that can be drawn from this reasoning is that the Guravas are not Brāhmaṇas, but they can officiate at rituals to Śiva.

49. This simply means that he retains his lower status but his devotional closeness to Śiva is heightened. We are operating not just with different levels of status but also with different kinds of status.

References cited

- Altekar, A. S. 1982 [1934]. The Rashtrakutas. In G. Yazdani, ed., The early history of the Deccan, 247–314. New Delhi: Oriental Book Reprint.
- Bailey, G. M. 1995. Gaṇeśapurāṇa. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz.
- Bapat, Jayant. 1998. A Jātipurāṇa (clan history myth) of the Gurav temple priests of Maharashtra. Asian studies review 22, 1: 63–77.
- Carroll, Lucy. 1978. Colonial perception of Hindu society and the emergence of caste associations. Journal of Asian studies 37, 2: 233–50.
- Cohn, Bernard S. 1968. Notes on the history of the study of Indian society and culture. In Milton Singer and Bernard S. Cohn, eds., Structure and change in Indian society, 3–28. Chicago: Aldine.
- Das, Veena. 1967–68. A sociological approach to the caste Puranas: A case study. Sociological Bulletin 16–17: 141–64.
- Devalaka Kathāmṛta. 1905. Devalaka Kathāmṛta, by Balshastri Upasani. Pune: Jagadhitecchu Press.
- Gaurava. 1981. Gaurava, by Omdatta Arya. Ujjain: Kirti Printing Press.
- Hutton, J. H. 1963. Caste in India. London: Oxford University Press.
- Laghu Śaivāgama. 1907. Laghu Śaivāgama, by Sitaram Dajiba Pande. Nagpur: Motivilas Press.
- Narayanabhatta. 1985. The bridge to the three holy cities: The Sāmānya-praghaṭṭaka of Nārāyaṇabhaṭṭa's Tristhalīsetu (ed. and trans. Richard Salomon). Delhi: Motilal Banarasidass.
- O'Malley, L. S. S. 1974 [1932]. Indian caste customs. Delhi: Vikas.
- Raste, Narayan Ramchandra. [1900]. The origin of the Ārya-Kṣatriyas. Bombay: Family Printing Press.
- Rocher, Ludo. 1986. The Purāṇas. Wiesbaden: Otto Harrassowitz.
- Śivamahimecī Nandāvratākathā. 1992. Śivamahimecī Nandāvratākathā, by Shankar Guruji. Pune: Comp-Print Press.
- Srinivas, M. N. 1967. Social change in modern India. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Sthūla Śaivāgama. 1909. Sthūla Śaivāgama, compiled by Kashinathaswami Jehurkar. Pune: Dattaprasada Press.

van der Veer, Peter. 1989 [1988]. Gods on earth: The management of religious experience and identity in a North Indian pilgrimage centre. Delhi: Oxford University Press.

van Gennep, Arnold. 1960 [1908]. The rites of passage (trans. Monika B. Vizedom and Gabrielle L. Caffee). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Weber, Max. 1958 [1920]. The religion of India: The sociology of Hinduism and Buddhism (ed. and trans. Hans H. Gerth and Don Martindale). New York: The Free Press.

JAYANT BHALCHANDRA BAPAT is a Research Fellow at the Monash Asia Institute, Monash University, Melbourne, Australia.